

MURRAY.

LIBRARY
UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA
DAVIS

Vol. III - Canon
Tale

(Lys Wright : 3912)

W. H. H. MURRAY,
THE MURRAY HOMESTEAD, GUILFORD, CONN.

"To-morrow? We know not who may own to-morrow."

Sincerely

A. H. Murray

THE ADIRONDACK TALES.

VOL. III,

MAMELONS AND UNGAVA, WITH
SUPPLEMENTARY NOTES.

---

W. H. H. MURRAY.

---

COPYRIGHTED, 1898.
ALL RIGHTS RESERVED.

LIBRARY

PRESS OF
SPRINGFIELD PRINTING AND BINDING COMPANY, SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

TO THAT AMERICAN

WHO KNOWS AND LOVES THE LEGENDARY LORE OF HIS NATIVE LAND, AND APPRECIATES WHAT I WOULD FAIN DO FOR IT IF I WERE ABLE ;
WHO, DISTINGUISHED BY THE BRIGHTNESS OF HIS WIT, THE GENTLENESS OF HIS NATURE, AND HIS LOVE OF POLITE LETTERS, IS BELOVED BY ALL WHO KNOW HIM ; TO

GEORGE STEWART, JR.,

D.C.L., D. LITT., F.R.G.S.,

OF QUEBEC,

I INSCRIBE THIS TALE OF MAMELONS.

THE AUTHOR.

AUTHOR'S PREFACE.

---

I HAVE for some years felt that the connection of the old races with the North American Continent, the signs and proofs of whose presence are to be found almost everywhere, and nowhere so frequently as on the St. Lawrence, afforded material for entertaining authorship. Prompted by this feeling, I have, during these several years past, been working at certain pieces of composition, of which this bit of romance is a fair sample.

If it shall so far please the reading public that its publisher shall not lose money by his venture — for letters in our time have no patronage save from the hope of selfish gain — I shall, later on, print others like to it. But if it fail, as it quite likely will, to bring him commercial profit, then they will be forgotten as this one will, until I better them, or they come to a better time.

W. H. H. MURRAY.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
THE LABRADOR PENINSULA . . . . .	I
ARGUMENT . . . . .	27

MAMELONS.

CHAPTER

I. THE TRAIL . . . . .	33
II. THE FIGHT AT MAMELONS . . . . .	57
III. THE MOTHER'S MESSAGE . . . . .	86
IV. LOVE'S VICTORY . . . . .	107
V. AT MAMELONS . . . . .	127

UNGAVA.

I. AFTER MAMELONS . . . . .	153
II. THE COMING OF UNGAVA . . . . .	170
III. UNGAVA'S LOVE . . . . .	180
IV. THE WIZARD OF THE NORTH . . . . .	197
V. THE CONJURER'S ACCOUNT OF THE GENE- SIS OF THE WORLD . . . . .	209
VI. THE WHITE GOD OF MISTASSINNI . . . . .	225
VII. THE COUNCIL OF THE CHIEFS . . . . .	239
VIII. DUEL OF THE OLD DUMB CHIEFS . . . . .	251
IX. THE FAIRIES' FAREWELL TO UNGAVA . . . . .	267

SUPPLEMENTARY NOTES.

THE SAGUENAY . . . . .	283
THE ST. LAWRENCE . . . . .	298
QUEBEC . . . . .	302
DURHAM TERRACE . . . . .	305
SAILING DOWN THE RICHELIEU . . . . .	324
THE FREEMASONRY OF OUTDOOR LIFE . . . . .	328

THE LABRADOR PENINSULA.

---

IF you will but glance at a map you will observe that the country north and east of a line drawn from the southern point of Hudson's Bay to Quebec is of enormous size, and those of us who have traversed it to any extent and studied its geography and its strange historic and pre-historic races and traditions, regard it as one of the most unique and interesting sections of the globe. Its physical characteristics are remarkable. It is a land of lakes, of rivers, of forests, of tangled swamps, of wild wastes, of rocky desolation, of strange phenomena.

The country lying between Hudson's Bay and the eastern line of Labrador, on a line drawn east and west, and from the St. Lawrence and Hudson's Straits drawn north and south, is a vast sweep of territory. The distance from Moose Factory, on the west side of James's Bay, to Eastern Labrador is as great as from Moose Factory to Washington, D. C. ! This will serve to give the American tourist some idea of its extent. Père Albanel, who partially trailed across this monstrous wilderness in 1671-2, notes that he met and overcome the opposition of two hundred Rapids and four hundred Portages; and he began his journey no farther east than Tadousac. No white man as far as is known, living or dead, has ever crossed this country from east to west, or from north to south, and save for a few patch-like settlements, as at Chicoutimi and Lake St. John, and a few straggling lumber camps, or fishing stations, it is an uninhabited wilderness, of a most savage character, only threaded here and there for short distances by trapping lines. The Jesuit missionary, Père Albanel, two hundred and fifty years ago, drew a trail across it from Tadousac to Hudson's Bay, a single trail through a space as wide as the country between Maine and Lake Erie. The Price Brothers have pushed their lumber camps a little beyond Lake St. John in spots. The government, some years ago, started two expeditions into it, that went a considerable distance, but completed nothing; while the Lake St. John Railway, and the Provincial Department of Crown Lands, have surveyed a score or more of townships or parishes; but beyond the scanty and unsatisfactory glimpses thus obtained, nothing is known of this monstrous forest, and wild waste of land. It is a terra incognita, as truly so as when it was, in popular belief, the home of pigmies, of dwarfs, of giants, of headless men and semi-human monsters.

In this connection it is fit to state, that there is no map of this region that is worthy to be dignified by such a name. The reason of this is because the first one was drawn from the depths of the map makers' imagination, and all subsequent ones have only repeated the first! The charts of the St. Lawrence coast are, of course, correct, but the land maps are useless. The survey made by John Bignell, Esq., begun at Bersimite and ending at Little Mistassinni, was scientifically conducted, and so far as he went he did his work well. But no map has been published of his survey, nor is there one likely to be.

This country has always been beyond the line of accurate knowledge. Mist and darkness have ever enveloped it. Fables have been told of it. In Charlevoix's history (history of New France, by Father Charlevoix), the translation of which by Dr. Shea, whose vast scholarship and high qualifications to do rarest work are well known among scholars, is a model of accuracy, and a monument to his learning, my readers will find several pages devoted to the myths and fables current in his day, regarding this wild North Land, then as now beyond the knowledge of civilized men.

Jacques Cartier narrates that the Indian King Donnacona told him "that in a country far remote from his own he saw men who did not eat but who lived on liquids. That in another region were men who had but one leg and thigh, with a very large foot, two hands on the same arm, the waist extremely square, the breast and head flat, and a very small mouth; and that in another place he had seen pigmies and a sea, the water of which was fresh." (Mistassinni or ———?)

In 1717 a young Esquimau girl was captured and brought to a Mr. de Courtemanche, on the coast of Labrador, and Father Charlevoix saw her at Quebec in 1720. This girl said that she had seen in her country men of monstrous size, and she described their physical characteristics as unlike other men's, being, according to her description, peculiar and monstrous. And she told the same story that nearly a hundred years before Donnacona had told Jacques Cartier, viz.: that she had seen men who had but one leg, one thigh, and a very large foot, two hands on the same arm, a broad body, flat head, small eyes, scarcely any nose, and a very small mouth. That they were always in bad humor, that they were amphibious, and could remain under water three-quarters of an hour at a time, and that the Esquimaux used them to fish up the fragments of ships wrecked on the coast. She also averred that in the northern extremity of Labrador, around Ungava Bay, was a people entirely black, with large lips, a broad nose, and straight hair; that these men were very wicked, and although badly armed, having only stone knives and axes, without any iron, they had rendered themselves a terror to the Esquimaux. Nor was this girl the only one who made kindred assertions. Had I space I could quote several authorities which state that black men (negroes) once lived north of the St. Lawrence. This same girl declared that in the North was a nation of pigmies, that the men were only three feet high and the women much shorter. And in 1605 the captains and sailors of some Danish vessels affirmed that near Hudson's Bay they had found a race of "little men with square heads, with pouting lips, who could not eat cooked meat, nor any kind of bread, nor drink wine at all."

In addition to such tales of strange, wicked, and unnatural beings who inhabited this north land, were, and still are, other things which stir the imagination. Among the Indians are many strange traditions about which one knows not what to believe. The Nasquapees, once a great people, now fast dying out, claim that they are descendants of an old and mighty race that lived in the far north when it was all summer there! It is among these strange people that remarkable spiritual manifestations occur. They were called Atheists by other Indians — if they be Indians — because they had no medicine man or conjurer. But in fact they are far from being Atheists, for they believe, as Christians do, in two Great Powers, one good, one evil, like our God and Satan. And they have a Prophet or High Priest who, they believe, has power to raise the dead, and foretell all that is to happen. The Saguenay, by common assent, is the most extraordinary river in the world. The tidal and other physical phenomena of Ungava Bay are most astonishing. Lake St. John is the most curious of all lakes to him who would explain its peculiarities. Great Mistassinni Lake is believed by some to be a fact, by others a myth, and in it or near it — if concurrent traditions of many tribes can be credited — is a cavern of such mysterious nature and prehistoric connection, that it were well worth years of search to find it. For it is believed by some that in it the kingly dead of a lost race and world were buried in prehistoric time, when the climate of the country was the reverse of what it is now, and that they still are there in state of perfect embalmment. Of other things I might speak in the same vein in proof that this unexplored country has always been regarded a weird land, had I space and would it profit any. But of its fables and mysticism I have said enough, and before I come down to modern and human characteristics will only allude briefly to its ancient population.

“In mist and glamour wrapped,”

The population of the Labrador Peninsula was of old time much more numerous than it is at present. The estimates, by the few who have given it any attention whatever, vary greatly, but this is true, that the estimates grow as we go backward in time, and doubtless from good reason. The earliest estimates are of the old mariners, and they are by far the largest and concurrent in substance. The Esquimaux, even a century ago, were much more numerous than now, while two centuries ago they seem to have been a very powerful people, able to put large forces into the field. They seem also to have been much larger in size than at present, and we know that the western Esquimaux are much larger men physically, averaging nearly if not quite six feet in height.

This shrinkage in population among the aboriginals in this region is due to several causes, but of these the chiefest are two — war and famine. A glance at the map will show the reader where to locate the Montagnais Indians or Mountaineers, the Esquimaux and the Nasquapees of Ungava, and in the geographical position which the Esquimaux held as related to the other two peoples was cause of endless war. The Esquimaux were geographically penned in between their enemies and the sea. The Nasquapees pressed down upon them from the north, the Montagnais from the west, and they must needs fight both for they were literally fighting for life. Thus wars were constant, and the population was cut down.

But within a hundred years, another cause has existed to reduce the population of the Labrador country. The food supply, once abundant in it, has failed. Formerly the white hare was very prolific here, and the country was filled with them. They are now nearly extinct. The hedgehog supplied the natives with another and sure provision for their wants. This animal has died out. The reindeer, moreover, were regular in their migrations. Now they are irregular. One year the number is adequate. Then, for several seasons, none or few are obtainable. The salmon, which once were in all the rivers, and free to all, are now denied the natives. A starving native may not take a fish, save by stealth. From these several causes, the native populations have been reduced in numbers, and dwarfed in stature, and fatally affected in morale, until they are fast becoming extinct. Scores are now, where hundreds once were; and the old tribes and remnants of old races, which might have connected modern with even prehistoric times, are passing away. No one who has not by patient gleaning of scattered facts, pregnant traditions, and suggestive myths, become familiar with the possible and inestimable value to the student of ethnology, of what might have been found among these dying and dead tribes, can appreciate the loss that modern scholarship has met in the changed conditions, and the extinction of that aboriginal life which once, in multitudes, peopled the vast stretch from Hudson's Bay to Labrador.

Nor must we overlook the relation which this country once held, and to a less degree still holds, to the wild life of woods and waters. From it, from the fifteenth century, the civilized world has drawn vast treasures in furs. Millions upon millions of dollars have been invested and made in this traffic. The beaver, the otter, the black and white bear, the ermine and fox, red, gray, and black, the fisher, sable, mink—what a list of precious furs might be enumerated that have been taken hence for the comfort and adornment of mankind! Kings have been more kingly because of these woods. Queens more queenly, and the loveliness of women and children more lovely. And to-day from the waters of its coast and from its shady recesses the epicurean markets and esthetic taste and pride of the world draw never failing supplies. Nor can one acquainted with the facts of the country predict a failure of the supply. For still as ever its waters are full of fish; in its deep depths of woods the wild fowl nest, and everywhere the skillful trapper still finds the fur waiting for his trap. Especially is it to-day the greatest fish preserve of the continent and even of the globe.

So much in general description of the country. One or two sections we will now describe and characterize in detail.

---

THE LAKE ST. JOHN REGION.

LAKE St. John is a geological curiosity and a geographical surprise. From the lay of the land and the general aspect of the country there should be no such lake or no lake at all where its wide waters roll. The great rivers that flow into it, topographically considered, did not need its great basin to receive them. Like the Maurice, the Batiscan, the Montmorency and the Jacques Cartier, they should have emptied directly into the St. Lawrence. But here the great lake is, where one would not expect to find it, and being here must, of course, be accounted for.

In shape, it is rounded like a saucer. Its circumference is almost a true circle. I never saw a lake whose formation was more perfectly circular to the eye. Like a saucer, it slopes gradually and evenly towards the center, where it is flat. It is nearly forty miles across it, and the bottom runs at an easy decline, from the shore line to the deepest depth, which is one hundred feet. Its shores are sand beaches, yellow as gold. It is embosomed in woods, which grow to the water edge, save at the southern arc, where a great conflagration swept the forest away, and a few straggling villages are. Into this vast reservoir flow the Ashuapmouchuan, the Mistassinni, the Miotassibi, the Peribonka, the Matabachuan, the Ouiatchouan. These are large rivers, which drain a vast watershed, whose northern ridge is far up toward Hudson Bay and the northern seas. Beside these, a dozen other streams, some of them large and deep, which bring down the surplus waters of the innumerable lakes, flow into it. These streams and lakes are full of fish and covered with wild fowl.

The vast region drained by these rivers and streams is nature's great fish preserve, the breeding ground of innumerable wild fowl and the home of all fur bearing animals. The bear, the beaver, the otter, the mink, fisher and martin, the wolf, the red, gray, and black fox are to be found in numbers on all the streams and lakes. Lake St. John is the center of a wilderness filled with these many kinds of game, and from it the sportsman can penetrate for hundreds of miles in all directions along the noiseless pathways of the woods and its forest shaded water courses. How did this great lake originate? There can be but one cause assigned. It empties into the Saguenay, that marvel of rivers, and when the Saguenay was made this lake was formed. The Saguenay is plainly of volcanic origin. It is a monstrous cleft opened by earthquake violence for sixty miles through a landscape of mountains formed of primeval rock. In old time a shock which shook the world burst the Laurentian range asunder at its St. Lawrence line, where Tadousac now is, and opened a chasm, two miles across, two thousand feet in depth and sixty miles in length straight northward. Thus was the Saguenay born. When this awful throe of nature rent the mountains asunder, the wilderness far inland felt the mighty shock, trembled and sank boldly downward. Into this sinking, this vast declension or subsidence of the land in the midst of this great northern forest, the rivers and streams from a vast watershed poured and formed the lake. This is the only way to account for Lake St. John — a reservoir of water so wide and shallow that its creation changed the climatic conditions of its locality and gave warmth and agricultural possibilities to a region two hundred miles north of the northern limit of cereal growth. It is a curiosity and a marvel, and as such well worth the seeing on the part of those who love knowledge and are intelligent enough to appreciate the extraordinary in nature.

Nor is this lake without its history — a history which reaches far back and connects it with nations and tribes before the white men came. For here it was, on the high circular shores of this great lake, so strangely placed at the center of a wilderness reaching from the coast of Labrador to the head waters of the Ottawa, and from the St. Lawrence to Hudson Bay, that the three mighty nations of red men, the Hurons, the Algonquins, and the Montagnais, were wont to make annual rendezvous to debate plans of war and peace, and engage in trade and barter. And with them, came the Nasquapees, from far Ungava Bay, unique among red men, because they had no medicine man (prophet) among them, and whose country reached from Lake Mistassinni on the west to the eastern limit of the Labrador peninsula. They were a mighty tribe, small of stature, but gifted to a degree in many things among their fellow red men, with a sense of smell so delicate that they scented fire beyond the sight of smoke, and trailed their game like blooded hounds. Among them the wonders of spirit rappings were known and practiced with a perfection that would make our modern spiritualists ashamed of their bungling séances, and the occult arts of legerdemain were as well known as they are to our Hermanns. And, besides these, to these great annual gatherings at Lake St. John came many other tribes pouring out of the great wilderness depths unpenetrated then, and unpenetrated now by white men, of the names and number of which no record tells a word. A Jesuit missionary stated that he had seen more than twenty Indian nations assembled at one of these great annual congresses on the shores of this wilderness hidden lake. Nor were these worthy missionaries devoid of the commercial instinct, as the Hudson Bay Company found to its cost. For it is written "that the reverend fathers, with rosaries, small crosses, relics, and abundance of prayers, procured more furs, and of a quality superior to that of those which the company could purchase with the merchandise which they imported at great expense from Europe."

There were many and good reasons, why these great Indian nations and tribes, with countless nomadic bands, made their annual rendezvous around the high, pine grown shores of Lake St. John. In the first place, it was centrally located, being midway between the western and eastern limits of the great Huron, Algonquin, and Montagnais families, and midway also on the line, north and south, which connects the St. Lawrence with the ridge of its great northern watershed. Hochelega and Ungava Bay, Lake Huron and eastern Labrador, could here, along easy water courses, converge at a common and convenient center. At this distant point, moreover, they were safe from the inroads of the terrible Iroquois, who represented a confederated ferocity, which ever and anon, leaving its lair on the Mohawk and the lakes in central New York, scoured the forest from Lake Huron to the Saguenay, fierce with the thirst for blood. And even when assembled on this far northern water, with two hundred miles of trackless forest, the Laurentian mountains, and four hundred miles of added distance between them and the dreaded Mohawks, these vast assemblages of ten thousand warriors did not feel wholly secure, but kept a cordon of outposts on the watch lest those tigers of the American continent, whose jaws were always red, should suddenly pounce upon them. It seems strange that so small a confederation, comparatively speaking, as was composed by the Five Nations, should be able, by their courage in war, to make their name a terror from Florida to the Arctic Ocean, and levy tribute from every tribe from Lake Superior to Chaleur Bay, and from the Gulf of Mexico to Hochelaga, now Montreal.

But another cause justified them in locating their great yearly congresses on Lake St. John, and the mention of it will cause surprise to readers not acquainted with the region, viz.: it is the warmest section north and east of the Ottawa. Although the lake is three hundred miles north of Montreal, the climate is, nevertheless, much milder there than it is at the base of Mount Royal. The cause of this is twofold. In the first place, the Laurentian mountains, which extend down the St. Lawrence on the north shore below the Saguenay, make a lofty rampart too high for the cold winds and fogs which the gulf sends up to scale. These gales from frozen Labrador lower the temperature south of this mountain wall twenty degrees beyond what it is north of it. Autumn has come to Quebec while summer lingers at Lake St. John.

Moreover, the lake itself is not without climatic influence. So large a body of shallow water resting on a sandy bottom, barely one hundred feet in depth at its deepest point, is quickly warmed when the sun comes north, and stores up a vast amount of latent heat which repels the early frosts from its immediate neighborhood. Early in October, last year, flowers and delicate garden growths were growing at Point Bleu in all their summer freshness, although three weeks before that date frost had blackened the gardens and fields around Quebec. For the same reason spring comes earlier here than to more southern shores, and the waters are more quickly freed from icy fetters and flow with rippling freedom. Because of these agreeable climatic conditions, as noticeable in old time as now, this lake was greatly liked by all the Indian nations, and made the favorite rendezvous, when from far and near they met each year upon its shores for council and barter.

It is most interesting to one who has gained knowledge of this great lake, thus favorably located and conditioned for such a purpose, and of its connections, to trace the pathways of this annual movement of nations and tribes from east to west, north and south, as they journeyed each year from remotest points toward the charming and secluded meeting spot. Down the Mistassinni they came from Hudson Bay in easy descent. From far Ungava, the Peribonka brought them swiftly. From the east and south the Bersimis and the Saguenay gave to their canoes a smoother highway than Rome ever builded for her chariots; while from the west, the Maurice and the Batiscan brought them within short portage of the shallow lake, on whose sandy banks their camp grounds waited for their coming. What a spectacle this lake and its encircling shores must have presented to the eye, when twenty nations in their barbaric vigor—at a time when many food animals, now extinct, filled all this great territory with plenty, and starvation was unknown—spotted its waters with their numberless canoes, and lighted, at evening, their countless campfires, under the mighty pines that belted, with a hundred miles of magnificent growth, the circling shore! Vanished forever are the mighty hordes that once found pleasure and plenty upon its banks; but the lake still remains as bright by day, as lovely by night, as when the red men, by nations and tribes, met in council, to trade, to gamble, and play their games upon its fragrant and delightfully shaded shores.

But, in one respect, the landscape around the lake is not as it was, for a change has come to the southern shore. Some thirty years ago a conflagration was kindled here, such as the world has seldom seen. The record of forest fires, east and west, might be searched in vain to find a parallel. It was no ordinary fire, but a cyclone of flames, that swept the earth as with the besom of destruction. Before its awful rush the solid forest was swept away as if its mighty trees were driest stubble. It flamed up suddenly at the southwest corner of the lake, swept around the southern arc of its circling shore as far as the Grande Descharge, then onward to the Saguenay. In seven hours that awful line of fire had gone one hundred and twenty miles; then it suddenly stopped, like a tiger glutted with prey. It scarred the face of the wilderness so deeply, that its ugly cicatrice remains raw and red to this day. In the line of its progress were a few scattered settlements. Men, women, and children fled to the lake and plunged in. Not all escaped. Some were caught in the woods; their bones even were never found. Some foolishly hid in their cellars; they were roasted alive. A great wooden cross by the roadside on the lake shore tells the passer-by to-day where a group thus met their dreadful death. It stands a solemn token of an awful event.

Some thought the end of the world had come, so dense the smoke, and high the fire, which flamed to the very sky, and said their prayers as at the threshold of judgment day. The heat was indescribable. It ate the woods like dry straw. It split the mighty rocks. Cliffs burst open and fell down with the noise of thunder. The soil in an instant was turned to ashes and whirled upward, leaving the foundation rocks of the world bare. The fish in the rivers came to surface as in boiling water. All living things in the path of the flame perished on the instant.

It came and went like a judgment, leaving not a root to smoke where it passed. An awful sight it was, and a vivid memory of its terrors lingers still along the trail where it swept. Well may men say that the like of it was never seen on earth before nor since.

For the reasons I have already pointed out, this lake was always a favorite resort of the red men, but there was another, and perhaps the strongest, reason why they loved to camp upon its shores. It was the home of the famous Wa-na-nish. Wherever this fish may be placed by scientists, or with whatever group classed, one thing is evident to all who have ever taken or eaten one, that it is the noblest game fish, after the salmon, in the world, and yields precedence to none upon the table. In appearance it resembles a landlocked salmon, but it takes a fly with the same eagerness and energy as the salmon displays, and, when struck, fights for liberty with such fierce vigor and persistence as to tax an angler's skill and tackle alike. This celebrated and justly admired fish, which, in the estimation of many judicious persons, ranks level with the king of game fish, whether on table or in water, makes its home, its only home, in and around

Lake St. John. Indeed, this body of water might in truth be called nature's great fish preserve, especially prepared for the propagation and preservation of this most noble fish and its beautiful congener — the spotted trout. For this vast reservoir of the woods receives the flowage of many and large rivers and of innumerable and rapid streams, so that into it naturally come not only vast supplies of food, but constant reinforcement of its resident stock also from all parts of the wilderness. For in these tributary waters there seems to be an apparent tendency for the largest fish grown in them, when at their fullest size, to seek this lake. May there not be among fish as among men an aristocracy of condition which causes the favored ones — those of the brightest spots and thickest sides — to group at favorite localities? And may not this golden colored basin of Lake St. John be a Back Bay or Fifth Avenue of aristocratic fishdom?

Be this suggestion in harmony with mere fancy or actual fact, the statement remains true that Lake St. John is the central home and avenue to such sport and angling as the American sportsman never enjoyed before. Maine and the Adirondacks, when in their best estate, and New Brunswick, are well known as localities where in times past great sport with the flies was had, and where, even now, fair average work with the rod may be done. But so far as size, condition, and numbers go, I have no reason to think that these noted localities were in their best days ever comparable with Lake St. John and its tributary and adjacent waters. There can be no question that the spotted trout of this north country attain a size seldom, if ever, equaled in any other water. Although I can offer no evidence that is actually final and beyond question, such as personal sight and visible proof of the scales, still, I have no cause to doubt that spotted trout weighing nearly, if not quite, fourteen pounds, have been captured in these waters, and that trout weighing eight and ten pounds are likely to be hooked among any catch one might make in certain localities.

If one should ask me: "What is the largest trout you ever caught in these waters?" I would in answer say that what I do with rod and rifle when trailing is no measure of the game in water or wood. I do not seek the forest as a sportsman, but as a lover of nature, and a student of woodcraft, with all that the word, to one like me, implies, and especially of those aboriginal tribes that once peopled it, and whose traditions still survive. I love the trail for the trail's sake, and the canoe as the most convenient and delightful mode of locomotion known to man. To hear a noise I cannot put a name to in the woods; to see a new shade of color on leaf or water; to see a beaver at work, or a family of otters at play; to outwit the cunning fox or feed a family of wild partridges from my hand, is a finer pleasure to me than angling or shooting. I carry rod and rifle for food's sake, rather than for pleasure, and use neither save to feed my hunger.

ARGUMENT.

---

THE development of the story turns upon the working of an old Indian prophecy or tradition, which had been in the Lenni-Lenape tribe, to the effect, that when an intermarriage between a princess of their tribe and a white man should occur, it would bring ruin to the tribe, and cause it to become extinct at Mamelons. For it was at the mouth of the Saguenay, as they held, that the whites first landed on this western continent. This intermarriage, or "cross of red with white," had occurred, and the time had nearly come when the last of the race should, in accordance with the old prophecy, die at Mamelons.

The persons introduced into this tale are John Norton the Trapper, who is comrade and bosom friend of the chief of the Lenni-Lenape; the chief himself, who is dying from an old wound received in a fight at Mamelons, and has sent a runner to summon the Trapper to his bedside, to receive his dying message; a very beautiful woman of that most peculiar and ancient of all known peoples, the Basques of Southern Spain, the last of their queenly line, who has been married in France by the chief's brother, and to whom a daughter has been born, Atla, the beautiful heroine of the story. And, in addition to these, is an old chief of the famous Mistassinni tribe, who had had his tongue cut out at the torture stake by the Esquimaux, from whose fury he had been rescued by a party of warriors, headed by the Trapper.

At Mamelons in a great fight, fought in the darkness and terror of an earthquake commotion, the chief of the Lenni-Lenape had, unknowingly, slain his brother, who, returning from France with his young Basque wife, had been wrecked on the coast of Labrador, and, out of gratitude to the Esquimaux, who had treated him kindly, he joined their ranks as they marched up to Mamelons and the great battle. Thus, fighting as foes, unknown to each other, in the darkness that enveloped the field, he was killed by his brother, having seriously wounded him in return.

The Basque princess, widowed by the untimely death of her young husband, gave birth to Atla, who was thus born an orphan, and under doom herself. Her mother, soon after the birth of Atla, was rescued from death by the Trapper, and loved him with all the ardor of her fervent nature. His affections she strove and hoped to win, and would, perhaps, have succeeded, had not death claimed her. Dying, she left her love and hopes as an heritage to her daughter, and charged her, with solemn tenderness, to win the Trapper's affection, and, married to him, become the mother of a mighty race, in whose blood the beauty and strength of the two oldest and handsomest races of the earth should be happily mingled.

The chief, knowing of her wish, and the instructions left to Atla by her departed mother, summons the Trapper to his deathbed, to tell him the origin of the doom, and the possibility or surety of its being avoided by his loving and marrying Atla. For, by the conditions of the old curse it was proclaimed when spoken, that the "doom shall not hold in case of son born in the female line from sire without a cross," viz.: from a pure-blooded white man. The Trapper in his humility feels himself to be unworthy of so splendid an alliance, and resists the natural promptings of his heart.

But at last the beautiful Atla wins him to a full confession; and at her urgent request, against the Trapper's wish, they start for Mame-lons to be married, where, before the rite is concluded, she dies, so fulfilling the old prediction of her father's tribe.

In the Basque princess, the mother of Atla, the author has striven to portray an utterly unconventional woman, natural, barbaric, original; splendid in her beauty, and glorious in her passions, such as actually lived in the world in the far past, when women were—it must be confessed—totally unlike the prevalent type of to-day. In her child, Atla, the same type of natural womanhood is preserved, but slightly sobered in tone and shade of expression. But, as studies of the beautiful and the unconventional in womanhood, both are unique and delightful.

NOTE.—The notes which have been connected in explanation of certain passages of the story are so peculiarly interesting and suggestive that they will make the reader wish that the author had extended them in fuller exposition of that "lore of woods and waters and of antique days" with which he is so familiar.

PUBLISHERS.

MAMELONS.

MAMELONS.*

A LEGEND OF THE SAGUENAY.

---

CHAPTER I.

THE TRAIL.

IT was a long and lonely trail, the southern end of which the Trapper struck in answer to the summons which a tired runner brought him from the north. The man had made brave running, for when he reached the Trapper's cabin and had placed the birch-bark packet in his hands, he staggered to a pile of skins and dropped heavily on them, like a hound which, from a three-days' chase, trails weakly to the hunter's door, spent nigh to death. So came the runner, running from the north, and, spent with his mighty race, dropped as one dead upon the pile of skins.

He bore the death-call of a friend, whose friendship had been tested on many an ambushed trail and the sharp edge of dubious battle. The call was writ on bark of birch, thin as the thinnest silk the ancients wove from gossamer in days when weaving was an art and mystery, and not a sordid trade to earn a pittance by, traced in delicate letters by a hand the Trapper would have died for. A good five hundred miles that trail ran northward before it ended at the couch of skins, in the great room of the great house, in which the Chief lay dying. And when the Trapper struck it he struck it as an eagle strikes homeward toward the cradle crag of his younglings, when talons are heavy and daylight scant. He lined his trail by the star that never sets, and little turning did he make for rivers, rapids, or tangled swamps; for mountain slope or briery windfall. It was a trail no man had ever trod — a blazeless* trail, unmarked by stroke of axe or cut of knife, by broken twig or sharpened rod, struck into mold or moss, and by its angle* telling whence came the trailer, whither went he, and how fast. From earliest dawn till night thickened the woods and massed the trees into a solid blackness, he hurried on, straight as a pigeon flies when homing, studying no sign for guidance, leaving none to tell that he had come and gone. He was at middle prime of life, tough and pliant as an ashen bow grown on hill, seasoned in hall, and toughened by battle handling for highest action, and now each muscle and sinew of his superbly conditioned frame was taut with tension of a mighty wish — to reach the bedside of the dying Chief before he died. For on the birchen bark the summons burned like fire: "Come to me quick, for I am alone with the terror of death. The Chief is dying. At Beacon Rock, on Nameless Lake, a canoe will wait you."

---

* Mamelons. The Indians' name for the mouth of the Saguenay, and signifies the Place of the Great Mounds.

---

* In order to mark the direction of his course in trailing through the woods the trailer slashes with his axe or knife the bark of the trees he passes, by which signs he is able to retrace his course safely, or follow the same trail easily some future time. A blazed trail is one thus plainly marked. A blazeless trail is one on which the trailer has no marks or "blazes" to run by, but draws his line by other and occult signs, which tell him in what direction he is going and which are known only by those initiated in the mysteries of woodcraft.

The Trapper was clad in buckskin from cap to moccasins. His tunic, belted tight and fringeless, was opened widely at the throat for freest breathing. A pack, small, but rounded

---

*Certain tribes of Indians north of the St. Lawrence left accurate record of their rate of progress, and how far they had come, by the length and angle of the slanted sticks they drove here and there into the ground as they sped on. The Nasquapees were best known as practicing this habit.

with strained fullness, was at his back. His horn and pouch were knotted to his side. In tightened belt was knife, and, trailing muzzle down and held reversed, a double rifle. Stripped was the man for speed, as when balanced on the issue of the race hang life and death. As some great ship, caught by a sudden gale off Anticosti or Dead Man's Reef, all bare of sail, stripped to her spars, past battures hollow and hoarse-voiced as death, and ghastly white, through the damned eddies that would suck her down and crush her with stones which grind forever, sharpening their cuttings with their horrid grists, runs scudding, so ran the strong man northward, urged by a fear stronger than that of wreck on the ghost-peopled shore of deadly St. Lawrence. A hound, huge of size, bred to a hair, ambled steadily on at heel. And though he crossed many a scent, and more than once his hurrying master started a buck warm from his nest, and nose was busy with knowledge of game afoot, he gave no whimper nor swerved aside, but, silent, followed his flying master as if he felt with him the solemn need which urged the trail northward. Never before had runner faced a longer or a harder trail, or under high command or deadly peril pushed it so fiercely forward.

Seven days the trail ran thus, and still the man, tireless of foot, hurried on, and the silent hound followed swiftly at heel. What a body was his, and how its powers responded to the summons of his soul! For on this seventh day of highest effort, taxing with heavy strain each muscle, bone, and joint to the utmost, days lengthened from earliest dawn to deepest gloaming, the strong man's face was fresh, his eye was bright, and he swung steadily onward, with long, swinging, easy-motioned gait, as if the prolonged and terrible effort he was making was but a morning's burst of speed for healthy exercise.

The climate favored him. October, with all its glorious colors, was on the woods, and the warm body of the air was charged through and through with cool atmospheric movements from the north. It was an air to race for one's life in. Soft to the lungs, but filled to its blue edge with oxygen and that mystic element men call ozone; the overflow of God's vitality spilled over the azure brim of heaven, whose volatile flavor fills the nose of him who breathes the air of mountains. Favored thus by rare conditions, the best that nature gives the trailer, the strong man raced along through the ripe woods like an old-time runner running for the laurel crown and the applause of Greece.

It was nigh sunset of the seventh day, and the Trapper halted beside a spring which bubbled coldly up from a cleft rock at the base of a cliff. He cast aside his hunting shirt, baring his body to the waist, and bathed himself in the cool water. He knelt to its mossy rim and sank his head slowly down into the refreshing depths, and held it there, that he might feel the delicious coolness run thrilling through his heated body. He cast his moccasins aside and bathed his feet, sore and hot from monstrous effort, sinking them knee deep in the cold flowage of the blessed spring. Then, refreshed, he stood upon the velvet bank, his mighty chest and back pink as a lady's palm, his strong feet glowing, his face aflush through its deep tan, while the wind dried him, and the golden leaves of the overhanging maples fell round him in showers.

Refreshed and strengthened, he reclathed himself, relaced his moccasins and tightened belt, but before he broke away he drew the sheet of birch-bark from his breast and read again the lines traced delicately thereon.

“Yes, I read aright,” he muttered to himself; “the writing on the birch is plain as ivy on the oak, and it says: ‘Come to me quick, for I am alone with the terror of death. The Chief lies dying. At Beacon Rock on Nameless Lake, a canoe will wait for you.’” And the Trapper thrust the writing back to its place above his heart and burst away down the decline that led to the lake at a run.

“I’ve bent the trail like a fool,” he muttered, as he reached the bottom of the dip, “or the lake lies hereaway,” and even as he spoke the waters of a lake, red with the red flame of the setting sun, gleamed like a field of fire through the maple trees. The Trapper dashed a hand into the air with a gesture of delight, and burst away again at a lope through the russet bushes and golden leaves that lay like plucked plumage, ankle deep, upon the ground toward the lake, burning redly through the trees not fifty rods beyond. A moment brought him to the shore, bordered thick with cedar growths, and, breaking through the fragrant branches with a leap, he landed on a beach of silver sand, and lo! to the left, not a dozen rods away, washed by the red waves, stood the Beacon Rock, fifty feet in height, and from water line to summit white as drifted snow.

“God be praised!” exclaimed the Trapper, and he lifted his cap reverently. “God be praised that I reckoned the course aright and ran the trail straight from end to end. For the woods be wide and long, and to have missed this lake would have been a sorry hap when one like her is alone with the dying. But where is the canoe that should be here, for sixty miles of water cannot be jumped like a brook or forded like a rapid, and the island lies nigh the western shore, and who may reach it afoot?” And he ran his eyes along the sand for signs to tell if boat or human foot had pressed it.

He searched the beach a mile around the bay, but not a sign of human presence could be found. Then nigh the signal rock he sat upon the sand, unloosed his pack, and from it took crust and meat, of which he ate, then fed the hound, sharing the scant supper with him equally. “It is the last morsel, Rover,” said the Trapper to the dog as he fed him. “It is the last morsel in the pack, and you and I will breakfast lightly unless luck comes." The dog surely understood the master's saying, for he rolled his hungry eyes toward the pack as if he sensed the bitter prophecy; then—canine philosopher as he was—he curled himself amid some dried leaves contentedly, as if by extra sleep he would make good the lack of food.

"Thou art wiser than men!" murmured the Trapper, gazing reflectively at his canine companion, now snoring in his warm russet bed. "Thou art wiser, my dog, than men, for they waste breath and time in bewailing their hard fortunes, but you make good the loss that pinches thee by holding fast and quickly to the nearest gain." And he gazed upon the sleeping hound with reflecting and admiring eyes.

Then slowly behind the western hills sank the red sun. The fervor faded from the water and the lake darkened. The winds died with the day. Gradually the farther shore retired from sight, and the distinguishing hills became blankly black. The upper air held on to the retreating light awhile, but finally surrendered the last trace, and night held all the world.

Amid the gathering gloom upon the beach the Trapper sat in counsel with his thoughts. At length he rose, and with dry driftage within reach kindled a fire. By the light of it he cut some branches of nigh cedars, and with them made a bed upon the sand, then cast himself upon his fragrant couch. Twice he rose and listened. Twice renewed the fire with larger sticks. At last, tired nature failed the will. The toil of the long trail fell heavily on him. Slumber captured his senses and he slept the sleep of sheer exhaustion. But before he slept he muttered to himself:—

“She said a canoe should wait me here, and the canoe will come.”

The hours passed on. The Dipper turned its circle in the northern sky, and stars rose and set. The warm shores felt the coolness of the night, and from the water's edge a soft mist flowed and floated in thin layers along the cooling sands. The logs of seasoned wood glowed with a steady warmth in the calm air. The fog turned yellow as it drifted above the burning brands, so that a halo crowned the ruddy heat. The night was at its middle watch, when the hound rose to his feet and questioned the lake with lifted nose, but his mouth gave no signal. If one was coming, it was the coming of a friend. Ten minutes passed, then he whined softly, and, walking to the water's edge, waited expectant; not long, for in a moment a canoe, moving silently, as if wind-blown, came floating toward the beach, and lodged upon it noiselessly, as bird on bough. And a girl, paddle in hand, stepped to his side, and, stooping, caressed his head, then moved toward the fire and stood above the sleeping man.

She gently stirred the brands until they flamed, and in the light thus made studied the strong face, bronzed with the tan of the woods, the face of one who never failed friend nor fought foe in vain, and who had come so far and swiftly in answer to her call. She was of that old race who lived in the morning of the world, when giants walked the earth* and the sons of God married the daughters of men.† And the old blood's love of strength was in her. She noted the power and symmetry of his mighty frame, which lay relaxed from tension in the graceful

---

*“There were giants in the earth in those days.”—Gen. vi. 4.

†“The sons of God saw the daughters of men that they were fair, and they took them wives of all which they chose.”—Gen. vi. 2.

attitude of sleep; the massive chest, broad as two common men's, which rose and fell to his deep-breathing; the great, strongly corded neck, rooted to the vast trunk as some huge oak grown on a rounded hill. She noted, too, the large and shapely head, the thick, black hair, closely cropped, and the sleeper's face — where might woman find another like it? — lean of flesh, large featured, plain, but stamped with the seal of honesty, chiseled clean of surplus by noble abstinence, and bearing on its front the look of pride, of power and courage to face foe or fate. Thus the girl sat and watched him as he slept, stirring the brands softly that she might not lose sight of a face which was to her the face of a god — such god as the proudest woman of her race, in the old time might, with art or goodness, have wooed and won and wedded.

Dawn came at last. The blue above turned gray. The stars shortened their pointed fires and faded. The east kindled and flamed. Heat flowed westward like an essential oil hidden in the pores and channels of the air; while light, brightly clean and clear, ran round the horizons, revealing its own and the loveliness of the world.

Then woke the birds. Morning found a voice sweet as her face. A hermit thrush sent her soft, pure call from the damp depths of the dripping woods. A woodpecker signaled breakfast with his hammer so sturdily that all the elfin echoes of the hills merrily mimicked him. An eagle, hunting through the sky, at the height of a mile, dropped like a plummet into the lake, and, struggling upward from his perilous plunge, heavily weighted, lined his slow flight straight toward his distant crag. The girl rose to her feet, and, leaning on her paddle, for a moment gazed long and tenderly at the sleeper's face, then softly breathed, "Awake, O Trapper, wake!"

The call, low as it was, broke through the leaden gates of slumber with the suddenness and effect of a great surprise. Quick as a flash he came to his feet, and, for a moment, stood dazed, bewildered, his bodily powers breaking out of sleep quicker than his senses, and he saw the girl as visitant in vision. He stepped to the water's edge and bathed his face, and turning, freshened and fully awake, saw, with glad and apprehensive eyes, who stood before him, and tenderly said: —

"Is the daughter of the old race well?"

"Well, well, I am, O Trapper," answered the girl, and her voice was low and softly musical, as water falling into water. "I am well, friend of my mother and my friend. And the Chief still lives and will live till you come, for so he bade me tell you." And she reached her small hand out to him. He took it in his own, and held it as one holds the hand of child, and answered: —

"I am glad. Thou comest like a bird in the night, silently. Why did you not awake me when you came?"

"Why should I wake thee, Trapper?" returned the girl. "I am a day ahead of that the Chief set for your coming. For our runner — the swiftest in the woods from Mistassinni to Labrador — said twelve suns must rise and set before my words could reach thee, and the Chief declared that no living man, not even you, could fetch the trail short of ten days. He timed me to this rock himself, and told me, when I would come nor wait another hour, that I would wait by the white rock two days before I saw your face. But I would come, for a voice within me said — a voice which runs vocal in our blood, and has so run through all my race since the beginning of the world — this voice within kept saying: 'Go, for thou shalt find him there!'"

And so I, hurrying, came. But tell me how many days were you upon the trail?"

"I fetched the trail in seven days from sun to sun," answered the Trapper, modestly.

"Seven days!" exclaimed the girl, while the light of a great surprise and admiration shone in her eyes. "Seven days! Thou hast the deer's foot, Trapper, and the cougar's strength. No wonder that the war chiefs love you."

And then after a moment's pause:—

"But tell me, why didst thou push the trail so fiercely?"

"I read your summons and I came," replied the Trapper, sententiously.

The girl started at the hearing of the words, which told her so simply of her power over the man in front of her. Her nostrils dilated, and through the glorious swarth of her cheek there came a flush of deeper red. The gloom of her eyes moistened like glass to the breath. Her ripe lips parted as to the passing of a gasp, and the full form lifted as if the spirit of passion within would fling the beautiful frame it filled upon the strong man's bosom. Thus a moment the sweet whirlwind seized and shook her, then passed. Her eyes drooped modestly, and with a sweet humbleness, as one who has received from heaven beyond her hope or merit, she simply said:—

“Trapper, I have brought you food. Come and eat.”

The food was of the woods. Bread coarse and brown, but sweet with the full cereal sweetness; corn, parched in the fire, which eaten lingered long as a rich flavor in the mouth; venison, roasted for a hunter's hunger, within whose crisp surface the life of the deer still showed redly; water from the lake, drunk from a cup shaped from the inner bark of the golden birch, whose hollow curvature still burned with warm chrome colors. So, on the cool lake shore, in the red light of early morn, they broke their fast.

The Trapper ate as a strong man eats after long toil and scant feeding, not grossly, but with a heartiness good to see. The girl ate little, and that absently, as if the atoms in her mouth were foreign to her senses and no taste followed eating.

“You do not eat,” exclaimed the Trapper. “The sun will darken on the lower hills before we come to food again. Are you not hungry?”

“Last night I was ahungered,” answered the girl, musingly. “But now I hunger no more,” and her face was as the face of a Madonna holding her child, full of a plentiful and sweet content.

“I do not understand you,” returned the Trapper, after a moment’s silence. “Your words be plain, but their sense is hidden. Why are you not hungry?”

“You read me once out of your sacred books, Trapper, that man does not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth,” responded the girl. “I knew not then the meaning of the words, for I was a girl, and had no understanding, and the words were old, older than your books, and therefore deeply wise, and I, being young, did not know. But now I know.” And here the girl paused a moment, hesitated as a young bird to leave the sure bough for the first time, then, rallying courage for the deed, gazed with her large eyes lovingly into his, and timidly explained: —

“I am not hungry, Trapper, for God has fed me!”

To the tanned cheek of the Trapper there rushed a glow like the flush to the face of a girl. The light of a happy astonishment leaped from his eyes, and his breath came strongly. Then light and color faded, and as one vexed and heartily ashamed of his vanity, while the lines of his face tightened, he made harsh answer:—

“Talk no more in riddles, lest I be a fool and read the riddle awry. Nor jest again on matters grave as life, lest I, who am but mortal man and slow withal, forget wisdom and take thy girlish playfulness for earnest talk. Nay, nay,” he added earnestly, as she rose to her feet with an exclamation of passionate pain. “Say not another word, you have done no ill. You be young and fanciful, and I — I be a fool! Come, let us go. The pull is long, and we shall need the full day’s light to reach the island ere night falls.” And, placing his rifle in the canoe, he signaled to the hound and seated himself at the oars. The girl obeyed his word, stepped to her place and pushed the light boat from the sands on which so much had been received and so much missed. Perhaps her woman’s heart foretold that love like hers would get, even as it gave, all at last.

The house was large and lofty, builded of logs squared smoothly and mortared neatly between the edges. In the thick walls were deep embrasures, that light through the great windows might be more abundant. The builders loved the sun and made wide pathways for its entrance everywhere. The casements, fashioned to receive storm shutters, were proof against winter's wind and lead alike. In the steep roof were dormer windows, glassed with panes, tightly soldered to the sash. At either end of the great house a huge chimney rose, whose solid masonry of stone stood boldly out from the hewn logs, framed closely against its mortared sides. A wide veranda ran the entire length of the southern side. A balustrade of cedar logs, each hewn until it showed its red and fragrant heart, ran round it. Above posts of the same sweetly odored wood — whose fragrance, with its substance, lasts forever — was lattice-work of poles stripped of their birchen bark, and snowy white, on which a huge vine ran its brown tracery, enriched with bunches, heavily pendent, of blue-black grapes — that pungent growth of northern woods, whose odors make the winding rivers sweet as heaven. In front, a natural lawn sloped to the yellow sands, on which the waves fell with soft sounds.

Eastward, a widely acred field showed careful husbandry. Garnet and yellow colored pods hung gracefully from the brown poles. The ripened corn gleamed golden through the parted husks, and beds of red and yellow beets patched the dark soil with their high colors. The solar flower turned its broad disk toward the wheeling sun, while dahlias, marigold, and hardy annuals, with their bright colors, warmed like a floral camp-fire the stretch of gray stubble and pale barren beyond. It was a lovely and a lonely spot, graced by a lordly home, such as the wealthy worthies builded here and there in the great wilderness for comfort and for safety in the old savage days when feudal lords* made good their claim to forest seigniories with sword and gun and every house was home and castle.

The canoe ran lightly shoreward. The beach received its pressure as a mother's bosom receives the child running from afar to its reception — yieldingly ; and on the welcoming sand the light bark rested. The Trapper stepped ashore

---

* The reader will recall that old Canada, viz., the Province of Quebec, was wholly French in origin, and that its organization rested on the feudal basis, the whole territory occupied being divided not into towns and counties, but into seigniories.

and reached a helping hand to the girl. Her velvet palm touched his, rough and strong, as thistle down, wind blown, the oak tree's bark, then nestled and stayed. Thus the two stood hand in hand, gazing up the sloping lawn at the great house, the broad, bright field and the circling forest, glowing with autumnal colors, which made the glorious background. The green lawn, the great gray house, and the vast woods belting it around, brightly beautiful, made such a landscape picture as Titian would have reveled in. It stood, this mansion of the woods, this wilderness castle, in glorious loneliness, a part and center of a splendid solitude, beyond the coming and going of men, beyond their wars and peace, the creation and embodiment of a mystery deep as the woods around it; a strange, astounding spectacle to one who did not know the history of the forest.

"It is a noble place," exclaimed the Trapper, as he gazed up the wide lawn at the great house, and swept with admiring glance the glorious circle of the woods which curved their belt of splendor round it; "it is a noble place, and if mortal man might find content on earth, he might find it here."

“Could you, O Trapper, living here, be content?” inquired the girl, and she lifted the splendor of her eyes to his strong, honest face.

“Content,” returned the Trapper, innocently, “why, what more could mortal crave than is here to his hand? A field to give him bread, a noble house to live in, the waters full of fish, the woods of game, the sugar of the maple for his sweetening, honey for his feasts, and not a trap within two hundred miles. What more could mortal man, of good judgment, crave?”

“Trapper, is there nothing else?” asked the girl.

“Aye, aye,” returned the Trapper, “one thing. I did forget the dog. A hunter should have his hound.”

A shade of pain, perhaps vexation, came to her face as she heard the Trapper’s answer. She withdrew her hand from his and said: “Food, fur, and a house are not enough. A dog is good for camp and trail. Solitude is sweet and the absence of wicked men a boon. But these do not make home nor heaven, both of which we crave and both of which are possible on earth, for the conditions are possible. The Chief has found this spot a dreary place since mother died.”

“Your mother was an angel,” answered the Trapper, “and your words are those of wisdom. I have thought at times of the things you hint at, and, as a boy, I had vain dreams, for nature is nature. But I have my ideas of woman and I love perfect things. And I—I am but a hunter, an unlearned man, without education, or house, or land, or gold, and I am not fit for any woman that is fit for me!”

The change that came to the girl's face at the Trapper's words—for he had spoken gravely, and through the honesty of his speech she looked and saw the greatness and humility of his nature—was one to be to him who saw it a memory forever. The shadow left it and its dusky splendor was lighted with a glow of a blessed assurance. This man would love her! This man with the eagle's eye, the deer's foot, the cougar's strength, the honest heart, would love her! This man her mother revered, her uncle loved, who twice had saved her life at the risk of his, whose skill and courage were the talk of a thousand camps, whose simple word in pledge held faster than others' oaths—this man into whose very bosom her soul had looked as into a clean place—this man would love her! If heaven be what good men say, and all its bliss had been pledged to her when she lay dying, her body would not have thrilled with a warmer glow than rushed its sweet heat through her veins at that instant of blessed conviction. Wait! She could wait for years, but she would win him — win him to herself; win him from his blindness, which did him honor, to that dazzling light in whose glory man stands but once; but, standing so, sees, with a glad bewilderment, that the woman he dares not love, because she is so infinitely better than he, loves him! Yes, she would win him — win him with such sweet art, such patient approaches, such seductiveness of innocent passion, slowly and deliciously disclosed, that he should never know of his temerity until, thus drawn to her, she held him in her arms irrevocably, in bonds that only cold and hateful death could part. Through all her leaping blood this blessed hope, this sure, sweet knowledge, flowed like spiced wine. This man, this man she worshiped, he would love her! It was enough. Her cup ran full to the brim and overflowed. She simply took the Trapper's hand again and said: —

“We will go to the chamber of the Chief. His eyes will brighten when he sees thy face.”

CHAPTER II.

THE FIGHT AT MAMELONS.*

“TRAPPER, it was a dreadful fight. We went into it a thousand warriors on a side, and in either army were twenty chiefs of fame. We fought the fight at Mamelons, where, at sunset, we met the Esquimaux,† coming up as we were going down. The Montagnais headed the war. The Mountaineers,‡ whose fathers’ wigwams stood at Mamelons, had fought the Esquimaux a thousand years, and both had wrongs to right. My father died that summer, and I, fresh from the fields of France, headed my tribe. You know how small it was, the last remnant of the old Lenape root, but every man a warrior. I knew not the right or wrong of it, nor did I care. I only knew our tribe was pledged to the

---

* This old battle-ground is located on the high terraces which define the several sand mounds now standing back of Tadousac.

† The Esquimaux were numerous and very warlike, and at one time had pushed their conquests clean up to the Saguenay.

‡ The Montagnais Indians held the country from Quebec down to the Esquimaux, near Seven Islands, and called themselves “Mountaineers.”

Nasquapees* of frozen Ungava, and they were allies of the Mountaineers, and hence the fight held us to its edge. That night we slept under truce, but when the sun came up went at it. I see that morning now. The sun from out the eastern sea rose red as blood. The Nasquapees, who lived as atheists without a Medicine man, cared not for this, but the prophet of the Mountaineers painted his face and body black as night, tore his blanket into shreds, and lay in the sand as one dead. The Nasquapees laughed, but we of the mountains knew by that dread sign that each man's face was set toward his last battle. We made it a brave doom. We fought till noon upon the shifting sands, nor gained an inch, nor did our foes, when suddenly the sun was clouded and a great wind arose that drove the sand so thickly that it hid the battle. The firing and the shouting ceased along the terrace where we fought, and a great, dread silence fell on the mighty mounds, save when the fierce gusts smote them. Thus, living and dead, friend and foe, we lay together, our faces plunged into the coarse gravel, our hands clutching the rounded stones, that we might breathe and stay until the wind should pass. And such a wind was never blown on man before, for it was hot and came straight down from heaven, so that our backs winced as we lay flattened. Thus, mixed and mingled, we clung to the hot stones, while some crept in beneath the dead for shelter. So both wars clung to the ground for an hour's space. Then, suddenly the sun rushed out, and shaking sand from eyes and hair, and spitting it from our mouths, at it we went again. Trapper, it was an awful fight, and more than once, in the mad midst of it, smoke-blinded and sand-choked, I thought of you and that I heard your rifle crack."

---

* The Nasquapees are one of the most remarkable families of Indians on the continent, and of whom but little is known. Their country extends from Lake Mistassinni eastward to Labrador, and from Ungava Bay to the coast mountains of the St. Lawrence. They are small in size, fine featured, with mild, dark eyes, and extremely small hands and feet. The name Nasquapees — Nasqupics — means "a people who stand straight." They have no Medicine man or Prophet, and hence are called by other tribes atheists. Their sense of smell is so acute that it rivals the dog's. "Spirit rappings," and other strange manifestations peculiar to us moderns, have been practiced immemorially among them, and carried to such a degree of success that one of our Boston séances would be a laughable and bungling affair to them. Their language is like that of the Western Crees, and their traditions point to a remote eastern origin.

"I would to God I had been there!" exclaimed the Trapper, and he dashed his huge hand into the air, as if cheering a line of battle on, while his eyes blazed and his face whitened.

“I would to God you had been!” returned the Chief. “For whether one lived through it, or died in it, we made it great by great fighting. For we fought it to the end in spite of interruptions.”

“Interruptions!” exclaimed the Trapper. “I do not understand ye, Chief. What but death could interrupt a fight like that?”

“Listen, Trapper, listen,” rejoined the Chief, excitedly. “Listen, that you may understand what stopped the fight, for never since man was born was fought such fight as we there fought, high up above the sea, that day at Mamelons, I told you it was an old feud between the Mountaineers and Esquimaux, a feud that had held its heat hot for a thousand years, and we, a thousand on each side, one for each year, fought on the sand, while above, below, and around the dead of a thousand years, slain in the feud, fought too.”

“Nay, nay,” exclaimed the Trapper. “Chief, it cannot be. The dead fight not, but live in peace forever, praise be to God,” and he bowed his head reverently.

“Trapper, that is your faith, not mine, for I hold to an older faith—that men by a knife’s thrust are not changed, but go, with all their passions with them, to the Spirit-Land, and there build upward on the old foundation. And so, I say again, that the dead of a thousand years fought in the air above and around us on that day at Mamelons. For in the pauses of the wind, we who fought on either side heard shrieks, and shouts, and tramlings as of ten thousand feet, and over us were roarings, and bellowings, and hollow noises, dreadful to hear, and through all the battle went the word that ‘the old dead were fighting, too!’ and that made us wild. Both sides went mad. The dying cheered the living, and the living cheered the dead. So went the battle—the fathers and the sons, the dead and living, hard at it. The waters of the Saguenay, a thousand feet below, were beaten into foam by the rush of fighting feet, and the roaring of a great battle filled its mouth. Its dark tide whitened with strange death froth from shore to shore, while ever and anon its surface shivered and shook. And under us on the high crest, cloud-wrapped, the earth trembled as we fought, so that more than once as we stood clinched, we two, the foe and I, still gripped for death, would pause until the ground grew steady, for its tremblings made us dizzy, then clinch the fiercer, mad with a great madness at being stopped in such death-grapple. Under us, all the long afternoon, the great mounds rose and sank like waves that have no base to stand upon. The clouds snowed ashes. Mud fell in showers. The air we breathed stank with brimstone and burned bones. And still it thickened, and still both sides, now but a scattered few, fought on, until at last, with a crash, as if the world had split apart, darkness, deep as death, fell suddenly, so that eyes were vain, and we who were not dead, unable to find foe, stood still. And thus the battle ended, even drawn, because God stopped the fight at Mamelons.*

---

* The Saguenay is undoubtedly of earthquake origin. The north shore of the St. Lawrence from Cape Tourmente to Point du Monts is one of the earthquake centers of the world. In 1663 a frightful series of convulsions occurred, lasting for more than four months ; and, it is said, that not a year passes that motions are not felt in the earth. The old maelstrom at Bai St. Paul was caused by subterranean force, and by subsequent shocks deprived of its terrible power. The mouth of the Saguenay was one of the great rendezvous of the Indian races long before Jacques Cartier came, and the great mounds above Tadousac have been the scene of many great Indian battles ; but I would not make affidavit that an earthquake ever did actually take place while one was being fought, although there may have been, and certainly, from an artistic point of view, there should have been such a poetic conjunction.

“At last the morning dawned at Mamelons, and never since those ancient beaches* saw the world’s first morning, had the round sun looked down on such a scene. The great terraces on which we fought were ankle deep with ashes mixed with mud, and cinders black and hard, like burned iron, and all the sand was soaked with blood. The dead were heaped. They lay like drifted wreckage on a beach, where the eddying surges of the battle tossed them in piles and tangled heaps like jammed timber. For in the darkness, we had fought by sound, and not by sight, and where the battle roared loudest, thither had we rushed, using axe and knife and the short seal spears of the damned Esquimaux. And all the later battle was fought breast to breast, for ere half were dead, powder and lead

---

* These mamelons, or great sand mounds, are believed to be the old geologic beaches of earliest times. They rise in tiers, or great terraces, one above the other, to a great height, the uppermost one being a thousand feet or more above the Saguenay, and represent, as they run down from terrace to terrace, the shrinking of the “face of the deep” in the creative period, by the shrinking of which the solid earth rose in sight.

gave out, and the fray was hand to hand, until, by the sickening darkness, God stopped it.

“I searched the dreadful field from end to end to find my own, and found them. With blackened hands, clouted with blood, I drew them together. Forty in all, I stretched them, side by side, and the savage pride of the old blood in me burst from my mouth in a shrill yell, when I saw that twenty swarthy bosoms showed the knife’s thrust deep and wide. They died like warriors, Trapper, true to the old Lenape blood, whose Tortoise* steadfastness upheld the world. I made a mound above their bodies, and heaped it high with rounded stones which crowned the uppermost beach, and made wail above friends and kindred fallen in strange feud. And there they sleep, on that high verge,

---

* The Lenni-Lenape had, at the coming of the whites, their territory on the Delaware, but their traditions point to long journeyings from the east over wide waters and cold countries. Their language, strange to say, has in it words identical with the old Basque tongue, and establishes some community of origin or history in the remote ages. The Lenni-Lenape had as their Totem, or sacred sign of origin and blood, a Tortoise with a globe on its back, and boasted that they were the oldest of all races of men, tracing their descent through the ages to that day when the world was upheld by a Tortoise, or turtle, resting in the midst of the waters. As a tribe they were very brave, proud, and honorable.

where the unwritten knowledge of my fathers, told from age to age, declares the waters of the earliest morning first found shore."

"Never did I hear a tale like this," exclaimed the Trapper. "Strange stories of this fight I heard in the far north, chanted in darkness at midnight, with wild wailing of the tribes; but I held it as the trick of sorcerers to frighten with. Go on and tell me all. Chief, what next befell thee?"

"Trapper, thou hast come half a thousand miles to hear a tale of death told by a dying man. Listen, and remember all I say, for at the close it touches close on thee. A fate whose meshes woven when our blood was crossed has tangled all that bore our name in ruin from the start, and with my going only one remains to suffer further."

Here the Chief paused while one might count a score, then, looking steadily at the Trapper, said : —

"Last month, when the raven was on the moon,* my warning came. The old wound opened without cause, and, lying on this bed,

---

* When the raven was on the moon. An Indian description of an eclipse.

I saw the hour of my death, and, beyond, thee, I saw, and beside thee the last and sweetest of our line, and the same doom was over her as has been to us all since the fatal cross—the doom which sends courage and beauty to a quick, sad death.”

“I do not understand,” replied the Trapper. “Tell me what befell thee further, step by step, and how I, a man without a cross,* can be connected with the old traditions of thy tribe and house.”

“Listen. In coming from the field, I saw, half-covered by the ashes, a body clothed in a foreign garb. It lay face downward where the dead were thickest, one arm outstretched, the hand of which, gloved to the wrist, still gripped a sword, red to its jeweled hilt. The head was foul with ash and sand, but I noted that the hair was black and long, and worn like a warrior’s of our ancient race. Then I remembered a habit of boyish days and pride. Trembling, I stooped, lifted the body upward and turned the dead face toward me. And there, there on that field of Mamelons, where it was said of old, before one of my blood had ever seen the salted shore, the last of our race should die, all foul with ash and sand and blood, brows knit with battle rage, teeth bared and tightly set, I saw my brother's face! ”

---

* A man without a cross, viz., a pure-blooded man. A white man without any Indian or foreign blood in his veins.

“God in heaven!” exclaimed the Trapper. “How came he there, and who killed him?”

“Trapper, you know our cross, and that the best blood of the old world and the new, older than the old, is in our veins. My grandsire was the son of one who stood next to the throne of France, and all our line have studied in her polished schools since red and white blood mingled in our veins. There did we two, my brother and I, remain until my father called us home. I left him high in the court's favor. Thence, suddenly, without sending word, with a young wife and office of trust, he voyaged, hoping to give me glad surprise. A tempest drove his ship on Labrador; but he saved wife and gold. The Esquimaux proved friendly, and gave him help, and, reckless of consequence, as have been all our line since the French taint came to us, not knowing cause, he joined the wild horde, and came with them to fatal Mamelons and its dread fight.

“So chanced it, Trapper. I dropped the body from my arms, for a great sickness seized me and my head swam, and in the bloody tangle of dead bodies I sat limp and lifeless. Then in a frenzy, clutching madly at a straw of hope, I tore the waistcoat, corded with gold, from the stiff breast to find proof that would not lie. And there, there above his heart, with eyes bloodshot and bulging, I saw the emblem of our tribe — the Tortoise, with the round world on his back; and through the sacred Totem of our ancient lineage, which our father's hand had tattooed on his chest and mine; yea, through it and the white skin above his heart, there gaped a gash, swollen and red, which my own knife had made. For in the darkness of the fight, bearing up against an Esquimaux rush, ash-blinded, I found a foe who swore in French and had a sword. He and I fought grappling in the dark, when the earth hove beneath our feet and ashes rained upon us; and his sword ran me through even as I thrust my long knife into him.

“ And thus at Mamelons, where sits the doom of our race awaiting us, in its dread fight, both fighting without cause, I slew my brother, and from his hand I got the wound from whose old poison I now die.

“Thus I stood among the dead at Mamelons, a chief without a tribe and my brother’s murderer. I moved some bodies and scraped downward, that I might have clean sand to fall upon; then drew my knife to let life out, and thus meet bravely the old doom foretold for me and mine as awaiting us since man was born on the shore of that first world. But even as I bent to the knife’s point, a voice called me and I turned.

“It was an Esquimau; the only chief left from the fight; my brother’s host seeking my brother. He knew me, for he and I had clinched in the great fight, but the earth opening parted us, and so both lived. Each felt for each as warriors feel for a brave foe when the red fight is ended and the field of death is heavy. Thus, battle-tired, amid the dead, we lifted hands, palm outward, and met in peace. He knew the language of old France, and I told him of my woe, of our old race, of tribesmen dead, of brother slain by my own hand, and of the doom that waited for us over Mamelons. And then he spoke and told me that which stayed my hand and held me unto further life.

“Seven days I journeyed with him, and on the eighth I came to where she sat, amid his children, in his rude house at Labrador. Never, since God created woman, was one made so beautiful as she. She was of that old Iberian race, whose birth is older than annals, whose men conquered the world and whose women wedded gods. She was a Basque,* and her

---

* As far back in time as annals or traditions extend, a race of men called Iberians dwelt on the Spanish peninsula. Winchell says that "these Iberians spread over Spain, Gaul, and the British Islands as early as 5000 B. C. When Egypt was only at her fourth dynasty this race had conquered all the world west of the Mediteranean."

They originally settled Sardinia, Italy, and Sicily, and spread northward as far as Norway and Sweden. Strabo says, speaking of a branch of this race: "They employ the art of writing, and have written books containing memorials of ancient times, and also poems and laws set in verse, for which they claim an antiquity of 6000 years. These old Iberians to-day are represented by the Basques. The Basques are fast dying out, and but a small remnant is left. They undoubtedly represent the first race of men. They are proud, merry, and passionate. The women are very beautiful, and noted for their wit, vivacity, and subtle grace of person. They love music, and dance much. Some of their dances are symbolic and connected with their ancient mysteries. Their language is unconnected with any European tongue or dialect, but, strange to say, it is connected by close resemblance, in many words, with the Maiya language of Central America and that of the Algonquin-Lenape and a few other of our Indian tribes. Duponceau says of the Basque tongue:—

"This language, preserved in a corner of Europe by a few thousand Mountaineers, is the sole remaining fragment of perhaps a hundred dialects, constructed on the same plan, which probably existed and were universally spoken at a remote period in that quarter of the world. Like the bones of the mammoth, ancestor's ships had anchored under Mamelons a thousand years before the Breton came. Fresh from the dreadful field, with heart of lead, my brother's face staring whitely at me as I talked, I told her all — the fight, the death of brother and of tribe, and the doom that waited for our blood above the shining sands at Mamelons.

“She listened to the end. Then rose and took my hand and kissed it, saying: ‘Brother, I kiss thy hand as head of our house. What's done is done. The dead cannot come back.’ Then, covering up her face with her rich laces, she went within the hanging skins, and for seven days was hidden with her woe.

“But when the seven days were passed she came, and we held council. Next morn, with ten canoes, deep laden with gold and precious stuffs, that portion of her dower saved from the wreck, we started hitherward. This island, after many days of voyaging, we reached, and landed here, by chance or fate I know not, for she spake the word that stopped us on this shore, not I. For on this island did my fathers live, it remains a monument of the destruction produced by a succession of ages. It stands single and alone of its kind, surrounded by idioms that have no affinity with it.”

---

and here the fateful cross came to our blood, that cross with France which was not fit; for the traditions of our tribe — a mystery for a thousand years — had said that any cross of red with white should ripen doom at Mamelons; for there it was the white first landed on the shore of this western world.*

“ She needed refuge, for within her life, another life was growing. Brooding, she prayed that the new soul within her might not be a boy. ‘A boy,’ she said, ‘ must meet the doom foretold. A girl, perchance, might not be held.’ Her faith and mine were one, save hers was older, she being of the old trunk stock, of which the world

---

* The antiquity of European visitation to the St. Lawrence is unascertained, and, perhaps, unascertainable. But there is good reason to think that long before Jacques Cartier, Cabot, or even the Norsemen, ever saw the American continent, the old Basque people carried on a regular commerce in fish and fur with the St. Lawrence. It is not impossible but that Columbus obtained sure knowledge of a western hemisphere from the old race, who dwelt, and had dwelt, immemorially among the mountains of Spain, as well as from the Norse charts. Their language, legends, traditions, and many signs compel one to the conclusion that the old Iberian race, who once held all modern Europe and the British isle in subjection, was of ocean origin, and pushed on the van of an old-time and world-wide navigation beyond the record of modern annals. Both Jacques Cartier and John Cabot found, with astonishment, old Basque names everywhere, as they sailed up the coast, the date of whose connection with the geography of the shores the natives could not tell.

supporting Tortoise was a branch; and so my blood was later, flowing from noonday fountains, while hers ran warm and red, a pure, sole stream, which burst from out the ponderous front of dead eternity, when, with His living rod, God smote it, in the red sunrise of the world. On this her soul was set, nor could I change her thought with reason, which I vainly tried, lest if the birth should prove a boy, the shock should kill her. But she held stoutly to it, saying: —

“ ‘The women of our race get what they crave. My child shall be a woman, and being so, win what she prays for.’

“And, lo! she had her wish; for when the babe was born it was a girl.

“All since is known to you, for you, by a strange fate, blown, like a cone of the high pine from the midst of whirlwinds, when forest fires are kindled and the gales made by their heat blow hot a thousand miles across the land, dropped on this island like help from Heaven. Twice was I saved from death by thee. Twice was she rescued at the peril of thy life; mother and child, by thy quick hand, snatched out of death. And when the cursed fever came, and she and I lay, like two burning brands, you nursed us both, and from your arms at last, her eyes upon you lovingly, her soul unwillingly, under fate, went from us. And her sweet form, instinct with the old grace and passion of that vanished race which once outrivaled Heaven's beauty and won wedlock with the gods, lay on your bosom as some rare rose, touched by untimely frost, while yet its royal bloom is opening to the sun, lies, leaf loosened, a lovely ruin rudely made on the harsh gravel walk."

Here the Chief stopped with a gasp, struck through and through with sharp pains. His face whitened and he groaned. The spasm passed, but left him weak. Rallying, with effort, he went on: —

"I must be brief. That spasm was the second. The third will end me. God! How the old stab jumps to-night!

"Trapper, you know how wide our titles reach. A hundred miles from east to west, from north to south, the manor runs. It is a princely stretch. A time will come when cities will be on it, and its deeds of warranty be worth a kingdom. Would that a boy outside the deadly limits of the cross, but dashed with the old blood in vein and skin, were born to heir

the place and live as master on these lakes and hills, on which the mighty chiefs who bore the Tortoise sign upon their breasts when it upheld the world, beyond the years of mortal memory, lived and hunted! For when the doom in the far past, before one of our blood had ever seen the salted shore, was spoken, it was said: —

“ ‘This doom, for sin against the blood, shall not touch one born in the female line from sire without a cross.’

“I tell you, Trapper, a thousand chiefs of the old race would leave their graves and fight again at Mamelons to see the old doom broken, and a boy, with one clear trace of ancient blood in vein and skin, ruling as master here! And I, who die to-night, and he who gave me death and whom I slew, would rise to lead them!

“Trapper, you I have called; you who have saved my life and whose life I have saved; you, who have stood in battle with me when the red line wavered and we two saved the fight; you who have the wild deer’s foot, the cougar’s strength, whose word once given stands, like a chief’s, the test of fire; you, all white in face, all red at heart, a Tortoise, and yet a man without a cross, have I called half a thousand miles to ask with my dying breath this question: —

“ May not that boy be born, the old race kept alive, the long curse stayed, and ended with my life forever be the doom of Mamelons? Speak, Trapper, friend, comrade in war, in hunt, and hall, speak to my failing ear, that I may die exultant and tell the thousand chiefs that throng to greet me in the Spirit-land that the old doom is lifted and a race with blood of theirs in vein and skin shall live and rule forever mid their native hills? ”

From the first word the strange tale, half chanted, had rolled onward like the great river flooding upward from the gulf, between narrowing banks, with swift and swifter motion, growing pent and tremulous as it flows, until it challenges the base of Cape Tourmente with thunder. And not until the dying Chief, with headlong haste, had launched the query forth — the solemn query, whose answer would fix the bounds of fate forever — did the Trapper dream whither the wild tale tended. His face whitened like a dead man's, and he stood dumb — dumb with doubt and fear and shame. At last, with effort, as when one lifts a mighty weight, he cried: —

“Chief, ye know not what ye ask. My God! I am not fit!”

Across the swarth face of the dying man there swept a flash of flame, and his glazed eyes lighted with a mighty joy.

“Enough! enough! It is enough!” he cried. “The women of her race will have their way, and she will win thee. God! If I might live to see that brave boy born, the spent fountain of the old race filled again by that rich tide in her which flows red and warm from the sunrise of the world!

“Nay, nay. Thou shalt not speak again. I leave it in the hands of fate. Before I pass the seeing eye will come, and I shall see if sunlight shines on Mamelons.”

He touched a silver bell above his head, and, after pause, the girl, in whom the beauty of her mother and her race lived on, whose form was lithe, but rounded full, whose face was dark as woods, but warmly toned with the old Basque splendor, like wine when light shines through it, type of the two oldest and handsomest races of the world, stood by his side.

Long gazed the Chief upon her, a vision too beautiful for earth, too warm for heaven. The light of a great pride was in his eyes, but shaded with mournful pity.

“Last of my race,” he murmured. “Last of my blood, farewell! Thou hast thy mother’s beauty, and not a trace of the damned cross is on thee. Follow thou thy heart. The women of thy race won so. My feet are on the endless trail blazed by my fathers for ten thousand years. I cannot tarry if I would. I leave thee under care of this just man. Be thou his comfort, as he will be thy shield. There is a chest, thy mother’s dying gift, thou knowest where. Open and read, then shalt thou know. Trapper, read thou the ritual of the church above my bier. So shall it please thee. Thou art the only Christian I ever knew who kept his word and did not cheat the red man. Some trace of the old faiths, therefore, there must be in these modern creeds, albeit the holders of them cheat and fight each other. But, daughter of my house, last of my blood, born under shadow, and it may be unto doom, make thou my burial in the old fashion of thy race, older than mine. These modern creeds and mushroom rituals are not for us whose faiths were born when God was on the earth, and His sons married the daughters of men. So bury me, that I may join the old-time folk who lived near neighbors to this modern God, and married their daughters to His sons."

Here paused he for a space, for the old wound jumped, and life flowed with his blood.

Then to his face there came a sudden change. His eyes grew fixed. He placed a hand above his staring orbs, as if to help them see afar. A moment thus. Then, whispering hoarsely, said : —

"Take thou this hand. Cling to it. The old Tortoise sight at death is coming. I see the past and future. Daughter, I see thee now, and by thy side, thy arms around his neck, his arms round thee, the man without a cross! Aye. She was right. 'The women of my race get what they crave.' Girl, thou hast won! Rejoice, rejoice and sing. But, oh! my God! My God! Trapper! look! Daughter, last of my blood, in spite of all, in spite of all, above thy head hangs, breaking black, the doom of Mamelons!"

And with these words of horror on his lips, the Chief, whose bosom bore the Tortoise sign, who killed his brother under doom at Mamelons, fell back and died.

Three days went by in silence. Then did the two build high his bier in the great hall, and place him on it, stripped like a warrior, to his waist, for so he charged the Trapper it should be. Thus sitting in the great chair of cedar, hewn to the fragrant heart, in the wide hall, hound at feet, the Tortoise showing plainly on his breast, a fire of great knots, gummed with odorous pitch, blazing on the hearth, the two, each by the faith that guided, made, for the dead chief of a dead tribe, strange funeral.

And first, the Trapper, standing by the bier, gazed long and steadfastly at the dead man's face. Then the girl, going to the mantel, reached for a book and placed it in his hand and stood beside him.

Then, after pause, he read: —

"I am the Resurrection and the Life."

And the liturgy, voiced deeply and slowly read, as by one who readeth little and labors with the words, sounded through the great hall solemnly.

Then the girl, standing by his side, in the splendor of her beauty, the lights shining warmly on the dark glory of her face, lifted up her voice — a voice fugitive from heaven's choir — and sang the words the Trapper had intoned: —

"I am the Resurrection and the Life."

And her rich tones, pure as note of hermit thrush cleaving the still air of forest swamps, clear as the song of morning lark singing in the dewy sky, rose to the hewn rafters and swelled against the compressing roof as if they would break out of such imprisonment, and roll their waves of sound afar and upward until they mingled with kindred tones in heaven.

Again the Trapper: —

“He who believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live !”

And again the marvelous voice pealed forth the words of everlasting hope, as if from the old race that lived in the dawn of the world, whose blood was in her rich and red, had come to her the memory of the music they had heard run thrilling through the happy air when the stars of the morning sang together for joy.

Alas, that such a voice from the old days of soul and song should lie smothered forever beneath the sand of Mamelons!

Thus the first part. For the Trapper, like a Christian man without cross, would give his dead friend holy burial. Then came a pause. And for a space the two sat silent in the great hall, while the pitch knots flamed and flared their splashes of red light through the gloom.

Then rose the girl and took the Trapper's place at the dead man's feet. Her hair, black with a glossy blackness, swept the floor. A jewel, large and lustrous, an heirloom of her mother's race, old as the world, burning with Atlantean flame, a miracle of stone-imprisoned fire, blazed on her brow. The large gloom of her eyes was turned upon the dead man's face, and the sadness of ten thousand years of life and loss was darkly orbed within their long and heavy lashes. Her small swarth hands hung lifeless at her side, and the bowed contour of her face drooped heavy with grief. Thus she, clothed in black cloth from head to foot, as if that old past, whose child she was, stood shrouded in her form, ready to make wail for the glory of men and the beauty of women it had seen buried forever in the silent tomb.

Thus stood she for a time, as if she held communion with the grave and death. Then opened she her mouth, and in the mode when song was language, she poured her feelings forth in that old tongue, which, like some fragrant fragment of sweet wood, borne northward by great ocean currents out of southern seas, for many days storm tossed, but lodged at last on some far shore and found by those who only sense the sweetness, but know not whence it came, lies lodged to-day upon the mountain slopes of Spain. Thus, in the old Basque tongue, sweet fiber of lost root, unknown to moderns, but soft, and sad, and wild with the joy, the love, the passion of ten thousand years, this child of the old past and the old faiths lifted up her voice and sang:—

“O Death! I hate thee! Cold thou art and dreadful to the touch of the warm hand and the sweet lips which, drawn by love’s dear habit, stoop to kiss the mouth for the long parting. Cold, cold art thou, and at thy touch the blood of men is chilled and the sweet glow in woman’s bosom frozen forever. Thou art great nature’s curse. The grape hates thee. Its blood of fire can neither make thee laugh, nor sing, nor dance. The sweet flower, and the fruit which ripens on the bough, nursing its juices from the maternal air, and the bird singing his love-song to his mate amid the blossoms,—hate thee! At touch of thine, O slayer! the flower fades, the fruit withers and falls, and the bird drops dumb into the grasses. Thou art the shadow on the sunshine of the world; the skeleton at all feasts; the marplot of great plans; the stench which founs all odors; the slayer of men and the murderer of women. O Death! I, child of an old race, last leaf from a tree that shadowed the world, warm in my youth, loving life, loving health, loving love, O Death! how I hate thee!"

Thus she sang, her full tones swelling fuller as she sang, until her voice sent its clear challenge bravely out to the black shadow on the sunshine of the world and the dread fate she hated.

Then did she a strange thing; a rite known to the morning of the world when all the living lived in the east and the dead went westward.

She took a gourd, filled to the brown brim, and placed it in the dead man's stiffened hand, then laid a rounded loaf beside his knee, and on a plate of copper at his feet — serpent edged, and in the center a pictured island lying low and long in the blue seas, bold with bluff mountains toward the east, but sinking westward until it ran from sight under the ocean's rim, a marvel of old art in metal working, lost for aye — she placed a living coal, and on it, from a golden acorn at her throat, which opened at touch, she shook a dust, which, falling on the coal, burned rosy red and filled the hall with languorous odors sweet as Heaven. Then, at triumphant pose, she sang:—

Water for thy thirst I have given,
Hurry on ! hurry on !
Bread for thy hunger beside thee,
Speed away ! speed away !
Fire for thy need at thy feet,
Mighty Chief, fly fast and fly far
• To the land where thy father and clansmen are waiting.
Odor and oil for the woman thou lovest,
Sweet and smooth may she be on thy breast,
When her soft arms enfold thee.

O Death ! thou art cheated !
He shall thirst never more ;
He shall eat and be filled ;
The fire at his feet will revive him ;
Oil and odor are his for the woman he loves ;
He shall live, he shall live on forever
With his sires and his people.
He shall love and be loved and be happy.

O ! Death grim and great,
O ! Death stark and cold,
By a child of the old race that first lived
And first met thee ;
The race that lived first still lives
And will live forever ;
By the child of the old blood, by a girl !
Thou art cheated !

CHAPTER III.

THE MOTHER'S MESSAGE.

EVENING was on the woods. The girl, her mother's message in her hands, gift from the chest that owned the golden key, sat reading the writing of the dead.

“ My daughter: They tell me I must die. I know it, for a chill, strange to my blood, is creeping through and thickening in my veins. It is the old tale told from the beginning of the world — of warm blood frozen when 'tis warmest, and beauty blasted at its fullest bloom. For I am at that age when woman's nature gives most and gets most from sun and flower, from touch of baby hands and man's strong love, and all the blood within her moves, tremulous with forces whose working makes her pure and sweet, as moves the strong wine in the cask when ripening its red strength and flavor. O daughter of a race that never lied save for a loved one! blood of my blood, remember that your mother died hating to die; died when life was fullest, sweetest, fiercest in her; for life is passionate force, and when full is fierce to crave, to seek, to have and hold, and has been so since man loved woman and by woman was beloved. And so it is with me. A woman, I crave to live, and, craving life, must die.

“Death! how I hate thee! What right hast thou to claim me now when I am at my sweetest? The withered and the wrinkled are for thee. For thee the colorless cheek, the shriveled breast, the skinny hand that shakes as shakes the leaf, frost smitten to its fall, the lusterless eye, and the lone soul that looketh longingly ahead where wait its loved ones; such are for thee, not I. For I am fair and fresh and full through every vein of those quick forces, which belong to life, and hate the grave. This, that you may know your mother died unwillingly, and dying hated death, as all of the old race and faith have ever done since he first came, a power, a mystery, and a curse into the world. For in the ancient annals of our fathers it was written ‘that in the beginning of the world there was no death, but life was all in all.’ God talked with them as father talks with children; their daughters were married to His sons, and earth and heaven were one.

“Your father was of France, but also of that blood next oldest ours. He was Lenape, a branch blown from that primal tree which was the world’s first growth, whose roots ran under ocean before the first world sank; a branch blown far by fate, which, falling, struck deep into the soil of this western world, and, vital with deathless sap, grew and became a tree. This was in ancient days, when thoughts of men were writ in pictures and the round world rested on a Tortoise’s back—emblem of water. For the first world was insular, and blue seas washed it from end to end, a mighty stretch, which reached from sunrise into sunset, through many zones. Long after men lost knowledge and the earth was flat, and for a thousand years the Tortoise symbol was an unread riddle save to us of the old blood, who knew the pictured tongue, and laughed to see the later races, mongrel in blood and rude, flatten out the globe of God until it lay flat as their ignorance. Your father was Lenape, who bore upon his breast the Tortoise symbol of old knowledge made safe by sacredness; for the wise men of his race, that the old fact might not be lost, but borne safely on like a dry seed blown over deserts until it comes to water, and, lodging, finds chance to grow into a full flowered, fruitful tree, made it, when they died and knowledge passed, the Totem of their tribe. Thus the dead symbol kept the living fact alive. Nor were there lacking other proofs that his blood was one with mine, though reaching us through world-wide channels. For in his tongue, like flecks of gold in heaps of common sand, were words of the old language, clear and bright with the original luster, when gold was sacred ornament and had no vulgar use. The mongrel moderns have made it base and fouled it with dirty trade; but in the beginning, and by those of primal blood, who knew they were of heaven, it was a sacred metal, held for God.*

“We met in France, and by French custom were allied. I was a girl, and knew not my own self, and he a boy scarce twenty. Reasons

---

* Among many of the ancient races gold and silver were sacred metals, not used in commerce, but dedicated as votive offerings, or sent to the temples as dues to the gods. Nothing more astonished and puzzled the natives of Peru and Mexico than the eagerness with which the Spaniards sought for gold, and the high value they put upon it. A West Indian savage traded a handful of gold dust with one of the sailors with Columbus for some small tool, and then ran as for his life to the woods, lest the sailor should repent his bargain and demand the tool to be given back!

of state there were to prompt our marriage, and so we were joined. He was of our old blood. That drew me, and no other thing, for love moved not within me, but nested calmly in my breast as a young bird, ere yet its wings are grown or it has thrilled with flight, rests in its downy cincture. He died at Mamelons; died, under doom. You know the tale. He died, and you came, fatherless, into the world.

“ You are your mother’s child. In face and form, in eye and every look, you are of me and not of him. The French cross in his blood made weakness, and the stronger blood prevailed. This is the law. A turbid stream sinks with quick ebb; the pure flows level on. The Jews prove this. The ancient wisdom stands in them. The creed which steals from their old faith whatever makes it strong has armed the world against them, but their blood wins. The old tide, red and true, unmixed, pure, laughs at these mongrel streams. Strong with pure strength it bides its time. The world will yet be theirs, and so the prophecy of their sacred books be met. Pure blood shall win, albeit muddy veins to-day are boasted of by fools.

“ But we are older far than they. The Jews are children, while on our heads the rime of hoary time rests white as snow. Our race was old when Egypt, sailing from our ancestral ports, reached, as a colony, the Nile.* From tideless Sea † to the Green Island in the west, ‡ from southern Spain to Arctic zones, the old Basque banner waved; while under Mamelons, where waits the doom for insult to pure blood, your fathers anchored ships from the beginning. What loss came to the earth when the gods of the old world, of whom we are, sank under sea and with them took the perfect knowledge! Alas! alas! the chill creeps in and on and I must hurry! I would make you wise before I die with a wisdom which none save the women of our race might speak or learn.

“ You will read this when I am fixed among the women of our race in the great realms where they are queens. For since the first the women of our race have ruled and had their way, whether for good or ill, and both have come to them and

---

* It is certain that the Iberian race settled on the Spanish peninsula a long time before the Egyptians, a sister colony from the same unknown parental source, doubtless, began their marvelous structures on the Nile.

† The Mediterranean.

‡ Ireland.

through them unto others. And so forever will it be. For beauty is a fate, and unto what 'tis set none know. The issue proves it and naught else. So be it. She who has the glory of the fate should have the courage to bide issue.

“Your body is my body; your face my face; your blood my blood. The warmth of the old fires are in it, and the sweet heat which glows in you will make you understand. You are my child, and being so, I give you of myself. I love. Love as the women of our race and only they may love. Love with a love that maketh all my life so that without it all is death to me. That love I, dying, bestow on you. It came to me like flash of fire on altar when holy oils are kindled and the censer swung. Here I first met him. Death had me. He fought and took me from his hand. In the beginning, men were large and strong, and women beautiful. Giants were on the earth, and our mothers wedded them. Each was a rose, thorn-guarded, and the strongest plucked her when in bloom and wore her, full of sweets, upon his bosom. Since then the women of our blood have loved large men. Weak ones we hated. None save the mighty, brawny, and brave have ever felt our soft arms round them, or our mouths on theirs. Thus has it been.

“ I loved him, for his strength was as the ancients, and with it gentleness like the gods. But he was humble, and knew not his own greatness, and, blinded by humility, he would not see that I was his. So I waited, waited as all women wait, that they may win. It is not art, but nature, the nature of a rose, which, daily opening more and more to perfect bloom in his warm light, makes the sun know his power at last. For love reveals all greatness in us, as it does all faults. Well did I know that he should see at last his fitness for me, and, without violence to himself, yield to my loveliness and be drawn within the circle of my arms. So should I win at last, as have the women of our race won always. But death mars all. So has it been since women lived. His is the only knife whose edge may cut the silken bands we wind round men. Vain is all else. Faiths may not stand against us, nor pride, nor honor. Our power draws stronger. The grave alone makes gap 'twixt lovely woman's loving and bridal bed. So, dying thus before my time, I am bereft of all.

“ But you shall win, for in you I shall live again and to full time. I know that you will love him, for you drew my passion to you with my milk, and all my thoughts were of him, when, with large receptive eyes, you lay a baby in my arms, day after day, scanning my face, love-lighted for him. Aye, you will love him. For in your sleep, cradled on the heart that worshiped him, its warmth for him warmed you, its beating thrilled, and from my mouth, murmured caressingly in dreams, your ears and tongue learned his dear name before mine own. So art thou fated unto love as I to death. Both could not win, and hence, perhaps, 'tis well I die. For had both lived, then both had loved, mother and child been rivals, and one suffered worse than dying. Nor am I without joy. For once, when I was wooing him with art he did not know, coaxing him up to me with sweet praises sweetly said, and purposely I swayed so my warm body fell into his arms and there lay for a moment, vibrant, all aglow, while all my woman's soul went through my lifted and dimmed eyes to him, I saw a flash of fire flame in his face, and felt a throb jump through his body, as the god woke in him, which told me he was mortal. And, faint with joy, I slid downward from his arms and in the fragrant grasses sat, throbbing, covering up my face with happy hands lest he should see the glory of it and be frightened at what his touch had done. I swear by the old blood, that moment's triumph honored, that the memory of that blissful time takes from death its sting and robs the grave of victory, as I lie dying.

“Yea, thou shalt win. The power will be in thee, as it has been in me, to win him or any whom women made as we set heart on. But woo him with that old art of innocence, snow white, though hot as fire, lost to the weak or brazen women of these mongrel races that fill the world to-day, who dare not dare, or daring, overdo. Be slow as sunrise. Let thy love dawn on him as morning dawns upon the earth, and warmth and light grow evenly, lest the quick flash blind him, or the sudden heat appall, and he see nothing right, but shrink from thee and his new self as from a wicked thing. I may not help thee. What fools these moderns are to think so! The dead have their own lives and loves, and note not the living. Else none might be at peace or know comfort above the sky, and all souls would make wail for wrongs and woes done and borne under sun. So is it well that parting should be parting, and what wall divides the dead from living be beyond penetration. For each woman's life is sole. Her plans are hidden with her love. Her skill is of it a sweet secrecy, and all her winning is self-won. I do not fear. Thou wilt have the wooing wisdom of thy race. Thy eyes are such as men give life to look into. The passion in thy blood would purchase thrones. Thou hast the grace of form which maddens men. Thy voice is music. Thy touch warm velvet to the skin. The first and perfect woman lives complete, in thee!

“No more. In the old land no one is left. The modern cancer eats all there. New fashions and new faiths crowd in. Only low blood is left, and that soon yields to pelf and pain. Last am I of the queenly line and thou art last of me. I came of gods. To gods I go. The tree that bore the fruit of knowledge for our sex in the sunrise of the world is stripped to the last sweet leaf. If thou shalt die leaving no root, the race God made is ended. With thee the gods quit earth, and the old red blood beats back and upward to the skies. Gold hast thou and broad acres. Youth and health are thine. Win his great strength to thee, for he is pure as strong, and from a primal man get perfect children, that in this new world in the west a new race may arise rich in old blood, born among the hills, strong with the strength of trees, whose sons shall be as mountains, and whose daughters as the lakes, whose loveliness is lovelier because of the reflected mountains dimly seen in them.

“Farewell. Love greatly. It is the only way that leadeth woman to her heaven. The moderns have a saying in their creed that God is love. In the beginning he was Father. The race that sprang from him said that, and said no more. It was enough. Love then was human, and we gloried in it. Not the pale love of barren nun, but love red as the rose, warm as the sun, the love of motherly women, sweet mouthed, deep breasted, voiced with cradle songs and soft melodies which made men love their homes. Love thou and live on the old level. Be not ashamed to be full woman. Love strength. Bear children to it. Be mother of a mighty race born for this western world. Multiply. Inherit; and send the old blood flowing from thy veins, a widening current, thrilling through the ages; that it may be as red, as pure, as strong at sunset as it was in the sunrise of the world.

“Once more, farewell, sweet daughter. These are last words, a voice from out the sunset, sweet and low as altar hymn wandering down the columned aisles of some old temple. So may it sound to thee. So live, so woo, so win, that when thou comest through the portals of the west to that fair throne amid those other ones which stretch their stateliness across the endless plain of ended things, which waits for thee as one has waited for every woman of our queenly line, thou shalt leave behind at going a new and noble race, from thee and him, in which the east and west, the sunrise and the sunset of the world, shall, like two equal glories, meet condensed and shine. So fare thee well. Fear not Mamelons. For if thou failest there, thou shalt be free of fault, and all the myriad millions of our blood shall out of sunset march, and from the shining sands of fate lift thee high and place thee on the last, the highest, and the whitest throne of our old line. So ends it. One more sweet kiss, sweet one. One more long look into his face — grave, grave and sad he gazeth at me. God! What a face he has! Shall I find match for it to-morrow when I stand, amid the royal, beyond sunset? Perhaps. Death, you have good breeding. You have waited well. Come now, I will go on with thee. Yes, yes, I see the way. 'Tis very plain. It has been hollowed by so many feet. Good-by to earthly light and life. It may be I shall find a better. I'll know to-morrow."

Here the scroll ended. Long the living sat pondering what the dead had writ. She kissed the writing as it were holy text. Then placed it in the chest, and turned the golden key and said: "Sweet mother, thou shalt live in me. Our race shall not die out. My love shall win him." Then went she to the great room wherein the Trapper by the red fire sat, and said:—

"Trapper, thou art my guest. What may I do to pleasure thee? Here thou must stay until my mind can order out my life and make the dubious road ahead look plain. While underneath my roof, I pray, command me."

All this with such grave dignity and sweet grace as she were queen and he some kinsman great and wise.

The Trapper stooped and lifted a huge log upon the fire, which broke the lower brands.

The chimney roared, and the large room brightened to the flame. Then, facing her, he said : —

“Guest I am and servant, both in one, and must be so awhile. Winter is on us. The fire feels snow. It putters as if the flakes were falling in it. It is a sign that never lies. Hark! you can hear the konk of geese as they wedge southward. The winter will be long, but I must stay.”

“And are you sorry you must stay?” replied the girl. “I will do what I may to make the days and nights pass swiftly.”

“Nay, nay, you do mistake,” returned the Trapper. “I am not sorry for myself, but thee. If I may only help thee: how can I help thee?”

“Trapper,” replied the girl, and she spoke with sweet earnestness as when the heart is vocal, “thou art a man, and wise; I am a girl, and know naught save books. But you, you have seen many men and tribes of men; counceled with chiefs, been comrade with the great, sharing their inner thoughts in peace and war, and thou has done great deeds thyself, of which fame speaks widely. Why do you cheapen your own value so, calling thyself a common man? My uncle said you were the best, the bravest, and the wisest man he ever met, and he had sat with kings and chiefs, and heard the best men of both worlds tell all they knew. Dear friend, wilt thou not be my teacher, and teach me that, which lieth now, like treasure hidden, locked in thy silence? ”

“ I teach thee ! ” exclaimed the Trapper. “ I, an unlettered man, a hunter of the woods, teach one who readeth every tongue, who knoweth all the past, to the beginning of the world, whose head has in it all these shelves of knowledge,” and the Trapper swept a gesture toward the thousand books that thickened the great hall from floor to ceiling. “ I teach thee ! ”

“ Yes, you,” answered the girl. “ You can teach me, or any woman that ever lived, or any man. For you were given at your birth the seeing eye, the listening ear, and the still patience of the mountain cat, which on the bare bough sits watching, from sunset until sunrise, motionless. In the old days such gifts meant wisdom, wider, deeper, more exact than that of books, for so my mother often told me. She said the wisest men who ever lived were those who, in deep woods and caves and on the shore of seas, saw, heard, and pondered on the life and mysteries of nature, noting all things, small and great, cause and effect, tracing out connections which interlace the parts into one whole, so making one solid woof of knowledge, covering all the world of fact and substance in the end. And once, when you were in the mood, and had been talking in the hall, drawn on and out by her, you told of climes and places you had seen, and strange things met in wandering, of great mounds builded by some ancient race, long dead; of cities, under sunset, still standing solid, without men; of tall and shapely pillars, writ with mystic characters, on the far shore of the mild sea, whence sailed the old dead of my race, at dying, far away to western heavens, where to-day they live; of caverns in deep earth, made glorious with crystals, stalactites, prisms, and shining ornaments, where, in old time, the gods of the under world were chambered; of trees that mingled bloom and fruitage the long year through, and flowers that never faded till the root died out; of creeping reptiles, snakes, and savage poisonous things that struck to kill, and of their antidotes, growing for man and beast amid the very grasses where they secreted venom; of rivers wide and deep, boiling up through solid earth, full-tided, which, flowing widely on, dropped suddenly like a plummet to the center of the world; of plains, fenced by the sky, far reaching as the level sea, so that the red sun rose and set in grasses; of fires which, lit by lightning, blackened the stars with smoke and burned all the world; of oceans in the west, which, flowing with joint floods, fell over mountains, plunging their weights of water sheer downward, so that the rocky framework of the round earth shook; of winds that blew as out of chaos, revolving on a hollow axis like a wheel buzzing, invisible, charged to the center with electric force, and fires which burst explosive, kindling the air like tinder; and of ten thousand marvels and curious things, which you have met, noted, and pondered on, seeking to know the primal fact or force which underlaid them. So that my mother said that night, when we were in our chamber, that you were the wisest man she ever met; wise with the wisdom of her ancient folk, whose knowledge lived, oral and terse, before the habit of book-making came to rive the solid substance, heavy and rich, into thin veneer, to make vain show for fools to wonder at. Teach me! Who might thou not teach, thou seeing, silent man, type of my first fathers, who, gifted with rare senses and with wit to question nature and to learn, mastered all wisdom before books were?"

"Aye, aye," returned the Trapper, not displeased to hear her praise as rare what seemed to him so common, "these things I know in truth, for I have wandered far, seen much, and noted closely, and he who sleeps in woods has time to think. But, girl, I am an unlearned man, and know naught of books."

"Books!" exclaimed the girl. "What are books but oral knowledge spread out in words which lack the fire of forceful utterance? But you shall know them. The winter days are short, the nights are long; our toil is simple; wood for the fire, food for the table, and a swift push each day along the snow for exercise; or, if the winds will keep some acres clean, our skates shall ring to the smitten ice, piercing it with tremblings till all the shores cry out. All other hours for sleep and books. I read in seven tongues, one so old that none save I in all the world can read it; for it was writ when letters were a mystery, known only unto those who fed the sacred fire and kept God's altars warm. And I will read you all the wisdom of the world, and its rare laughter, which, mother said, was the fine effervesce of wisdom, the pungent foam and sparkle of it. So you shall know. And one old scroll there is, rolled in foil of gold, sealed with the serpent seal, symbol of eternity, scribed with pictured knowledge, an heirloom of my race, whose key alone I have, writ in rainbow colors, when the world was young, the language of the gods, who first made signs for speech and put the speaking mouth upon a page. It was the first I learned. My mother taught it to me standing at her knee—for so the law says it shall be done, a law old with twice ten thousand years of age—that he who knows this scroll shall teach it, under silence, to his or her first-born, standing at knee, that the old knowledge of prime things and days may not perish from the earth it tells of, but live on forever while the earth endures. For on it is the record of the beginning, told by those who saw it; of the first man and how he came to be; of woman, first, when born and of what style. A list of healing simples, antidotes 'gainst death, and of rare oils which search the bones and members of the mortal frame and banish pain; and others yet, sweet to the nose, and volatile, that make the face to shine, for feasts and happy days, and, being poured on women, make their skin softer than down, whiter than drifted snow, and so clean and clear that the rich blood pinks through it like a red rose centered in crystal. And on it, too, is written other and strange rules, wild and weird. How one may have the seeing eye come to him. How to call up the wicked dead from underground, and summon from their heaven in the west, where they live and love, the blessed. How marriage came to man with woman. What part is his to act and what part hers, that each may be a joy to other, and she thus honored, be as sweet slip grafted on a vital trunk, full flowered in fullest growth, and fruitful of what the old gods loved, children, healthy, fair, and strong; all will I read thee, talking as we read, that we, with sharpened thought, may bite through to the vital gist, deep centered within the hard rind of words, and taste the living sweetness of true sense. So will we teach each other and grow wise equally; you, me the knowledge of things and places you have seen; I, you the knowledge writ in books that I have read."

CHAPTER IV.

LOVE'S VICTORY.

NEXT day, the Trapper's sign proved true. Winter fell whitely on the world. Its soft fleece floated downward to the earth whiter than washed wools. The waters of the lake blackened in contrast to the shores. The flying leaves—tardy vagrants from the branch—were smothered 'mid the flakes, and dropped like shot birds. Toward night the wind arose. The forest moaned. At sunset, in the gray gloom, a flock of ducks roared southward through the whirling storm. A field of geese, leaderless, bewildered, blinded by the driving flakes, scented water, and, like a noisy mob, fell, with a mighty splash, into the lake. Summer went with the day, and with the night came winter, white, cold, and stormy, roaring loudly through the air.

In the great hall sat the two. The logs on the wide hearth piled high, glowed red—a solid coal from end to end, cracked with concentric rings. They reddened the hall, books, skins, and antlered trophies of the chase. The strong man and the girl's dark face stood forth in the warm luminance, pre-Raphaelite. The Trapper sat in a great chair, built solidly of rounded wood, untouched by tool, but softly cushioned. The girl, recumbent, rested on a pile of skins, black with the glossy blackness of the bear, full furred. Her dress, a garnet velvet, from the looms of France. Her moccasins, snow white. On either wrist a serpent coil of gold. A diamond at her throat. A red fez on her head, while over her rich dress the glossy masses of her hair fell tangled to her feet. She read from an old book, bound with rich plush, whose leaves were vellum, edged with artful garniture and lettered richly with crimson ink — a precious relic of old literature, saved from those vandal flames which burned the stored knowledge of the world to ashes at Alexandria. The characters were Phœnician, and told the story of that race to which we owe our modern alphabet; whose ships, a thousand years before the Christ, went freighted with letters, seeking baser commerce, to every shore of the wide world. She read by the fire's red light, and the ruddy glow fell vividly on the pictured page, the rich dress outlining her full form and the swarth beauty of her face. It was the story of an old race — no library has it now — the story of their rise, their glory, and their fall. She read for hours, pausing here and there to tell her listener of connecting things — of Rome that was not then; of Greece yet to be born; of Egypt, swarming on the Nile and building monuments for eternity, and of her ancient race, west of the tideless sea, whose annals, even then, reached backward through ten thousand years, thus making clear what otherwise were dark, and teaching him all history. So passed the hours till midnight struck. Then she arose, and lifting goblet half-filled with water, poured it on the hearth, saying: “I spill this water to a race whose going emptied half the world.” This solemnly, for she was of the past, and held to its old fashions, knowing all its symbolism, its rites, its daily customs, and what they meant, for so she had been taught, and nothing else, by her whose blood and beauty she repeated. Then took the Trapper’s hand and laid it on her head, bent low, and said: “Dear friend, I am so glad to serve you. I have enjoyed this night beyond all nights I ever knew. I hope for many others like to it, and even sweeter.” And saying this she looked with glad and peaceful eyes into his face, and glided noiselessly from the room.

The Trapper piled high the logs again, and, lying down upon the skins where she had lain, gazed with wide eyes into the coals. The gray was in the sky before he slept, and in his sleep he murmured: "It cannot be. I am an unlearned man and poor. I am not fit." Above him in her chamber, nestling in sleep, the girl sighed in her dreams and murmured: "How blind he is!" And then: "My love shall win him!"

Dear girl, sweet soul of womanhood, gift to these gilded days from the old solid past, I would the thought had never come to me to tell this tale of Mamelons!

So went the winter; and so the two grew upward side by side in knowledge. He learning of the past as taught in books; of men long dead whose names had been unknown to him; of deeds done by the mighty of the world; of cities, monuments, tombs long buried; of races who mastered the world and died mastered by their own weaknesses; of faiths, philosophies, and creeds once bright and strong as fire, now cold and weak as sodden ashes; of vanished rites and mysteries and lost arts which once were the world's wonder — all were unfolded to him, so that his strong mind grasped the main point of each and understood the whole. And she learned much from him; of bird and beast and fish; of climates and their growths; of rocks and trees; of nature's signs and movements by day and night; of wandering tribes and mongrel races; the lore of woods and waters, and the differences in governments which shape the lives of men. So taught they each the other; she, swift of thought and full of eastern fire; he, slower minded, but calm, sagacious, comprehensive, remembering all and settling all in wise conclusion. Two better halves, in mind and soul and body, to make a perfect whole, were never brought by fate together since God made male and female. The past and present, fire and wood, fancy and judgment, beauty to win and strength to hold, sound minds in sound bodies, the perfect womanhood and manhood ideal, typical, met, conjoined in them.

Slowly she won him. Slowly she drew him, with the innocence of loving, to oneness in wish and thought and feeling, with her sweet self. Slowly, as the moon lifts the great tide, she lifted him toward her, until his nature stood highest, full flooded, nigh, bathed in all the wide, deep flowing of its greatness, in her white radiance. It was an angel's mission, and all the wild passion of her blood, original, barbaric, was sobered with reverent thought of the great destiny that she, wedded to him, stood heir to. She had no other hope, nor wish, nor dream, than to be his. She was all woman. This life was all to her. She had no future. If she had, she wisely put it by until she came to it. She took no thought of far to-morrow. Sufficient for the day was the joy or sorrow of it. She lived. She loved. That was enough. What more might be to woman than to live, to love, worship her husband, and bear children? Such life were heaven. If other heaven there were she could not crave it, being satisfied. So felt she. So had she felt. So acted that it might be; and now, at last, she stood on that white line each perfect woman climbs to, passing which, radiant, content, grateful, she enters — heaven.

Spring came. Heat touched the snow, and it grew liquid. The hills murmured as with many tongues, and low music flowed rippling down their sides. The warm earth sweetened with odors. Sap stirred in root and bough, and the fibered sod thrilled with delicious passages of new life.

From the far South came flaming plumage, breasts of gold and winged music to the groves. The pent roots of herbs, spiced and pungent, burst upward through the moistened mould, and breathed wild, gamy odors through the woods. The skeleton trees thickened with leaf formations, and hid their naked grayness under green and gold. Each day birds of passage, pressed by parental instinct, slanted wings toward the lake, and, sailing inward, to secluded bays, made haste to search for nests. Mother otters swam heavy through the tide, and the great turtles, lumbering from the water, dug deep pits under starlight, in the sand, and cunningly piled their pyramid of eggs. All nature loved and mated, each class of life in its own order, and God began the re-creation of the world.

The two were standing under leafy screen on the lake's shore, the warm sun overhead and the wide water lying level at their feet. Nature's mood was on them, and their hearts, like equal atmospheres, flowed to sweet union. Reverently they spoke, as soul to soul, concealing nothing, having nothing to conceal, of their deep feeling and of duty unto each. The girl held up her clean, sweet nature unto him, that he might see it, wholly his forever; and he kept nothing back. She knew he loved her, and to her the task to make him feel the honor she received in being loved by him. So stood they, alone in the deep woods, apart from men, in grave, sweet counsel. Thus spake the man:—

“I love you, Atla; you know it. I would lay down my life for you. But our marriage may not be. I am too old.”

“Too old!” replied the girl. “Thou hast seen fifty years, I twenty. Thou art the riper, sweeter, better; that is all. I would not wed a boy. The women of our race have wedded men, big bodied, strong to fight, to save, to make home safe, their country free, and fame, that richest heritage to children. My mother broke the rule, and rued it. She might have rued it worse had death not cut the tightening error which knotted her to coming torture. My heart holds hard to the old law made for the women of our race by ancient wisdom: ‘Wed not boys, but wed grave and gentle men. For women would be ruled, and who, of pride and fire, would be ruled by striplings?' And again: 'Let ivy seek the full-grown oak, nor cling to saplings.' I love the laws that were, love the old faiths and customs. They filled the world with beauty and brave men. They gave great nature opportunity to keep great, kept noble blood from base, strength from wedding weakness, and barred out mongrelism from the world, which in the ancient days was deadliest sin, corrupting all. O love! you do mistake, saying 'I am too old.' For women have ever the child's habit in them. They love to be held in arms, love to look up to loving eyes, love to be commanded, and obey strong sovereignty. The husband is head—head of the house. He sits in wide authority, and from his wisdom flow counsel, command, which all the house, wife, children, and servants, bend to, obedient. How can a stripling fill such seat? How sit such dignity on a beardless face? How, save from seasoned strength, such safety come to all? O full grown man! be oak to me, and let me twine my weakness round thy strength, that I may find safe lodgment, nor be shaken in my roots when storms blow strong. Too old! I would thy head were sown with the white rime of added years. So should I love thee more!"

Ah me, such pleading from love's mouth, such sweet entreaty from love's heart, man never heard before, in these raw days, when callow youth is fondled by weak women, and boys with starting beards push wisdom, gray and grave, from council chairs.

Then, in reply, the Trapper said: —

“Atla, it cannot be. I will admit that you say sooth. My years do not forbid. Boys are rash, hot-headed, quick of tongue, ill-mannered, lacking patience, just sense, and slow-mannered gentleness which comes with added years, and that deep knowledge which slows blood and gentles speech, and I do see that you fit well to these, and would be happier with a man thus characterized. But, letting that go by—and all my heart is grateful that it may—still marriage may not be between us, for thou art rich and I am poor, and so it should not be. For husband should own house; the wife make home. What say you, am I right or wrong?”

To which the girl made answer: “Trapper, thou art an old-time man, and this judgment fits the ancient wisdom. For in the beginning so it was. The male built nest, the female feathered it with song. So each had part in common ministry. The man was greater, richer, than the woman, and with earthly substance did endow. And she in turn gave sweet companionship, and sang loneliness from his life with mother songs and children's prattle. Thus in the beginning. Yea, thou art right, as thou art always right. For, being sound in heart and head, thou canst not err. Thy judgment goes straight to the center of the truth as goes thy bullet. But as men lived and died, change came to the first order. For men without male issue died and left great dower to girls. Women, by no fault of theirs, nor lack of modesty, grew rich by gifts of death, which are the gifts of fate. And changing circumstance changed all, making the old law void. The gods pondered, and a new order rose. By chance, at first, then by ordainment, royalty left male and followed female blood, because their blood was truer to itself, less vagrant, purer, better kept. And women of red blood and pure, clothed in royalty from shame, made alliances with men whom their souls loved, and gave rank, wealth, and their sweet selves in lavishness of loving, which gives all and keeps nothing back. Such was the habit of my race and line from age to age, even as I read you from the pictured scroll, rolled in foil of gold, that only I, of all the world, can read; and if I die, leaving no child, the golden secret goes with me to the gods, and all the ancient lore is lost to men forever. This to assist your judgment and make the scales hang level from your hand for just decision. Am I to blame because I stand as heir to ancient blood and wealth? Shall these wide acres, gold in yonder house, gems in casket, and diamonds worn for ten thousand years by women of my race, queens of the olden time, when in their hands they lifted world-wide scepters, divide thee and me? Has love no weight in the just scales you, by the working of some old fate, I know not what, hold over me and my soul's wish to-day? Be just to your own soul, be just to mine, and fling these doubts aside as settled forever by the mighty Power that works in darkness, and through darkness, to the light, shaping our fates and ordering life and death, joy and grief, beyond our power to fix or change. Blown by two winds, whose coming and going we list not, we two meet here. Strong art thou and I am weak, but shall thy strength repel my weakness? Rich, without fault, I am. My blood is older than these hills, purer than yonder water, and wilt thou make an accident, light as a feather in just balances, outweigh a fact sweet as heaven, heavy as fate? The queens of old, whose blood is one with mine, who spake the self-same tongue and loved the self-same way, chose men to be their kings; so I, by the same law, choose thee. Be thou my king. Rule me in love. By the old right and rule of all my race, I place thy hand upon my head, and so pass under yoke. I am thy subject, and all my days shall be a sweet subjection. Do with me as thou wilt. I make no terms. My feet shall walk with thine to the dark edge of death. Further I know not. This life we may make sure. The next is or is not ours to order. No man may say. Lord of my earthly life, take me, take me to thy arms, that I, last of an old race, last of its blood, left sole in all the world, without father, mother, friend, may feel I am beloved by him I worship, and drink one glad, sweet cup before I go to touch the bitter edge of dubious chance at Mamelons."

Then love prevailed. Doubt went from out his soul. His nature, unrestrained, leaped up in a red rush of joy to eyes and face. He lifted hands and opened arms to her. To them she swept, as bird into safe thicket, chased by hawk, with a glad cry. Panting she lay upon his bosom, trembling through all her frame, placed mouth to his and lost all sense but feeling. Then, with a gasp, drew back and lifted dewy eyes to his, as fed child to nursing mother's face, or saint her worshipping gaze to God's.

But the gods of her old race, standing beyond sunset, lifted high, saw, farther on, the sandy slope of Mamelons, and, while she lay in heaven on her lover's breast, they bent low their heads and wept.

Spring multiplied its days and growths. Night followed night as star follows star in their far circuits, wheeling forever on. Each morn brought sweet surprise to each. For like the growths of nature so grew their love fuller with bloom each morn; with fragrance fuller each dewy night. Her nature, under love's warmth, grew richer, seeding at its core for sweeter, larger life. His borrowed tone and color from her own, and fragrance. So, in the happy days of the long spring, as earth grew warmer, sweeter with the days, the two grew, with common growth and closer, until they stood in primal unity, no longer twain, but one.

One day she came and put her hand in his, and said: —

“ Dear love, there is an old rite by which my people married. It bindeth to the grave; no farther. For there the old faith stopped, not knowing what life might be beyond, or by whom ordered. Thine goeth on through death as light through darkness, and holds the hope that earthly union lasts forever. It may be so. Perhaps the Galilean knew better than the gods what is within the veil, for so the symbol is. It is a winning faith. My heart accepts it as a happy chance; and, did it not, it would not matter. Thy faith is mine, and thine shall be my God. Perchance the ancient deities and your modern One are but the same, with different names. We worshiped ours with fruits and flowers and incense; with dancing feet, glad songs, and altars garlanded with flowers, moistened with wine; you, yours with doleful music, bare rites, the beggary of petition and cold reasoning. Ours was the better fashion, for it kept alive the joyousness of children, gladly grateful for father gifts, and so prolonged the happy childhood of the world. But in this thy faith is better — it hangs a star above the tide of death for love to steer by. My heart accepts the sign. Thy faith is mine. We will go down to Mamelons, and there be married by the holy man who wears upon his breast the sign you trust to."

"Nay, nay; it shall not be," exclaimed the Trapper. "Atla, thou shalt not go to Mamelons. There waits the doom for the mixed blood. There died thy father, and all its sands are full of moldering men. We will be married here by the old custom of thy people, and God, who looketh at the heart and knoweth all, will bless us."

"Dear love," returned the girl, "thy word is law to me. I have no other. It shall be as thou wilt. But listen to my folly or my wisdom, I know not which it is: I fear not Mamelons. There is no coward blood in me. The women of our race face fate with open eyes. So it has been from the beginning. Death sees no pallor in our cheeks. To love we say farewell, then graveward go with steady steps. The women of my house—a lengthy line, stretching downward from the past beyond annals—whose blood flows red in me, lived queens, and, dying, died as they lived. I would die so; lest, if thy faith is true, they would not own me kin nor give me place among them when I came, if I feared fate or death. Besides, the doom may not hold good toward me. I know my uncle saw the sight; but he was only Tortoise, a branch blown far from the old tree and lost a thousand years amid strange peoples, and his sight could not, therefore, be sure. Moreover, love, if the curse holds, and I am under doom, how may I escape? For fate is fate, and he who runs, runs quickest into it. So let us go, I pray, to Mamelons, and there be married by the holy man, the symbol * on whose breast was known to our old race and carved on altars ten thousand years before the simple Jew was born at Bethlehem. So shall the symbol of the old faith and the new be for the first time kissed by two who represent the sunrise and the sunset of the world; and the god of morning and of evening be proved to be the same, though worshiped under different names."

---

* The cross as a symbol is traceable through all the old races, even the remotest in point of time. It was originally a symbol of plenty and joy, and so stood emblematic of happiness for tens of thousands of years. The Romans connected it with their criminal law, as we have the gallows, and so it became a symbol of shame and sorrow.

He yielded, and the two made ready to set face toward Mamelons.

There was, serving in her house, an old red servitor, who had been chief, in other days, of Mistassinni.* His dwindled tribe lives still upon the lake which reaches northward beyond knowledge. But he, longer than her life, had lived in the great house, a lifelong guest, but serving it in his wild fashion. Warring with Nasquapees

---

* This lake lies to the northwest of Lake St. John some 300 miles, and within some 200 miles of James Bay. It was first discovered by white men in the person of Père Abanel, in 1661, a Jesuit missionary, en route to Hudson's Bay. This is the lake about which so much has been said in Canada and the States, and so much printed. In fact, very little is accurately known of it, unless we assume that the late survey by Mr. Low is to be regarded as a settlement of the matter—which few, if any, acquainted with the Mistassinni question would do. Having examined all the data bearing on the subject, I can but conclude that the bit of water which Mr. Low said he surveyed was only a small arm or branch of the lake reaching south from it, and that the Great Mistassinni itself was never seen by Mr. Low, much less surveyed. Unless we concluded with the ancient cynic that “all men are liars,” then there surely is a vast body of water known to the natives as Big Mistassinni, lying in the wilderness several hundreds of miles from Hudson's Bay, yet to be visited and surveyed by white men. Mista, in Indian dialect, means great, and sinni means a stone or rock. And hence Mistassinni means the “Lake of Great Stones or Rocks.” The Assiniboine, or Rocky River, Indians of the West were evidently of the same blood and language originally with these red men of the northern wilds.

and Mountaineers against the Esquimaux, he had been overcome in ambush and in the center of their camp put to the torture. Grimly he stood the test of fire, not making moan as their knives seamed him and the heated spear points seared. Maddened, one pried his jaws apart with edge of hatchet, and tore his tongue out, saying, in devilish jest, "If thou wilt not talk, thou hast no need of this," and ate it before his eyes. Then the Chief, with twice a hundred braves, burst in upon them, and whirled the hellish brood, in roaring battle, out of the world. The Trapper, plunging through whirring hatchets and red spear points, sent the cursed fagots flying that blazed upward to his bloody mouth and so saved him to the world. Crippled beyond hope of leadership, he left his tribe, and, toiling slowly through the woods, came to the Chief in the great house and said, in the quick language of silent signs: "I am no longer chief — I cannot fight. Let me stay here until I die."

Thus came he, and so stayed, keeping, through many years, the larder full of game and fish. This wrinkled withered man went with them, paddling his birch slowly on, deep laden with needed stuffs and precious things for dress and ornament at the marriage. For she said: "I will put on the raiment of my race when my foremothers reigned o'er half the world, and their banners, woven of cloth of gold, dark, with an emerald island at the center, waved over ships which bore the trident at their bows, their sailors anchored under Mamelons a thousand and a thousand years before Spain sprang, a mushroom from the old Iberian mold. I will stand or fall forever, Queen at Mamelons." So said she, and so meant. For all her blood thrilled with the haughty courage of that past, when fate was faced with open, steady eyes, and the god Death, that moderns tremble at, was met by men who gazed into his gloomy orbs with haughty stare as he came blackening on. So, silently the silent man went on in his light bark, loaded with robes heavy with flowered gold, woven of old in looms whose soft movements, going deftly to and fro, sound no more, leaving no ripple as it went, steered by his withered hands, down the black rivers of the north, toward feast or funeral under Mamelons.

CHAPTER V.

AT MAMELONS.

SUMMER was at its hottest. The woods, sweltering under heavy heat, sweat odors from every gummy pore. Flowers, unless water-rooted, withered on their stalks. The lumbering moose came to the streams and stayed. The hot hills drove him down. The feathered mothers of the streams led down their downy progeny to wider waters. The days were hot as ovens and the nights dewless. The soft sky hardened and shone brazen from pole to pole. The poplar leaves shrank from their trembling twigs and the birches shriveled in the heat. But on the rivers the air was moist and cool, lily-sweetened; and above their heads, at night, the yellow stars swung in their courses like golden globes, large, soft, and round. So the two boats went on through lovely lakes, floating slowly down the flowing rivers without hap or hazard, till they came to the last portage, beyond which flowed the Stygian river, * whose gloomy tide flows out of death into bright life at Mamelons.

They took the shortest trail. Straight up it ran over the mighty ridge which downward slopes on the far side, eastward to that strange bay men call Eternity. It was an old trail, only ran by runners who ran for life and death when war blazed suddenly and tribes were summoned in hot haste to rally. But she was happy hearted, and, half jesting, half in earnest, said: "Take the short trail. My heart is like a bird flying, long kept from home. Let me go straight." So on the trail the two men toiled all day, while she played with the sands upon the shore and crowned herself with lilies, saying: "The queens of my old line loved lilies. I will have lily at my throat when I am wed."

So, when night had come, the boats and all their lading were on the other side, and they were on the ridge, which sloped either way, the sunset at their backs, the gloomy gorge ahead. Then, pausing on the crest, swept to its rocks by rasping winds, the sunset at her back, the gloom before, she said: "Here will we bivouac. The sky is dewless, and the air is cool. The trail from this runs easy down. I would start with sunrise on my face toward Mamelons."

---

* The waters of the Saguenay are unlike those of any other river known. They are a purple-brown, and, looked at en masse, are, to the eye, almost black. This peculiar color gives it a most gloomy and grewsome look, and serves to vastly deepen the profound impression its other peculiar characteristics make upon the mind.

So was it done, and they made camp beneath the trees, a short walk from the ridge, where the great spruce stood thickly, and a spring boiled upward through the gravel, cold as ice.

The evening passed like a sweet song through dewy air. She was so full of health, so richly gifted, so happy in her heart, so nigh to wedded life with him she worshiped, that her soul was full of joyousness, as the lark's throat, soaring skyward, is of song. She chattered like a magpie in many tongues, translating rare old bits of foreign wit and ancient mirth with apt and laughable grimaces. Her face was mobile, rounding with jollity or lengthening with woe at will. She had the light foot and the pliant limb, the superb pose, abandon, and the languishing repose of her old race, whose princesses, with velvet feet, tinkling ankles, and forms voluptuous, lithe as snakes, danced before kings and won kingdoms with applause from those whom, by their wheeling, swaying, flashing beauty, they made wild. She danced the dances of the East, when dancing was a language and a worship, with pantomime so rare and eloquent that the pleased eye translated every motion, as the ear catches the quick speech. Then sang she the old songs of buried days, sad, wild, and sweet as love singing at death's door to memory and to hope; the song of joys departed and of joys to come. So passed the evening till the eastern stars, wheeling upward, stood in the zenith. Then with lingering lips she kissed her lover on the mouth, and on her couch of fragrant boughs fell fast asleep, forgetful of all things but life and love; murmuring softly in her happy dreams, "To-morrow night," and after a little space, again, "Sweet, sweet to-morrow!"

But all the long evening through, the old tongueless chief of measureless Mistassinni sat as an Indian sits when death is coming — back straightened, face motionless, and eyes fixed on vacancy. Not till the girl lay sleeping on the boughs did he stir muscle. Then he rose up, and with dilating nostrils tested the air, and his throat rattled. Then put his ear to earth, as man to wall, listening to the voices running through the framework of the world,* cast cones upon the dying brands, and, standing in the light made by the gummy rolls, said to the Trapper in dumb show: "The dead are moving. The earth cracks beneath the leaves. The old trail is filled with warriors hurrying eastward out of death. Their spears are slanted as when men fly. They wave us downward toward the river. Call her you love from dreamland and let us go."

To which the Trapper, answering, signed: "Chief, old age is on you, and the memory of old fights. 'Tis always so with you red men.† The old fields stir you, and here upon this ridge we fought your fight of rescue. God! what a rush we made! The air was full of hatchets as of acorns under shaken oaks when I burst through.

---

* I have been often surprised at the many and strange sounds which may at times be heard by putting the ear flat to the sod or to the bark of trees. Even the sides of rocks are not dumb, but often resonant with noises — of running waters, probably — deep within. It would seem that every formation of matter had, in some degree, the characteristics of a whispering gallery, and that, were our ears only acute enough, we might hear all sounds moving in the world.

† It is said that Indians cannot sleep upon a battlefield, however old, because of superstitious fear. They admit themselves that it is not well to do it, and always, under one excuse or another, avoid doing so.

I kicked an old skull under moss as we halted here, that she might not see it. It lies under that yellow tuft. I have ears, and I tell you nothing stirs. It is your superstition, chief. Neither living nor dead have passed to-night. A man without cross knows better. I will wait here till dawn. She said, 'I would see sunrise in my face when I start for Mamelons,' and she shall. I have said."

To this the chief, after pause, signed back:—

"I have stood the test, and from the burning stake went beyond flesh. I have seen the dead, and know them. I say the dead have passed to-night. Even as she danced her happy dances, and you laughed, I saw them crowd the ridge and come, filing downward. They fled with slanted spears. You know the sign. It was a warning, and for us and her. For, with the rest, heading the line, there walked two chiefs whose bosoms bore the Tortoise sign. I knew them. They slanted spears at her, and waved us down; then glided on at speed. And others yet I saw, not of my race—a woman floating in the air, her mother, clothed as she shall be to-morrow, and with her a long line of faces, like to hers asleep, save eager looking, anxious; and they, too, waved us downward toward the river. This is no riddle, Trapper. It is plain. When do the dead move without cause? Awake your bride from dreams and come down. Some fate is flying with flat wings this way, I know not what. I only know the dead have waved me toward water, and I go."

So saying, he took the dark trail downward, and in the darkness disappeared.

"The spell is on him," muttered the Trapper, as he sodded the brands, "and naught may stop him. The old fool will do some stumbling on the trail before his moccasins touch sand." And saying this, he gently kissed the sleeping girl, and, taking her small hand in his strong palm, he fell asleep; sleeping upon the crumbling edge of fate and death, not knowing. Had he but known! Then might wedding bells, not wail, have sounded over Mamelons.

"Awake! awake! My God, the fire is on us, Atla!" so roared he, standing straight.

Up sprang she, quick as a flash, and stood in the red light by his side, cool, collected, while with swift, steady hands, she clothed herself for flight. Then swept with haughty glance the flaming ridge and said: "The light that lights my way to Mamelons, my love, is hotter than sunrise; but we may head it." Then, with him, turned, and fled with rapid, but sure, feet down the smoking trail.

The fire was that old one which burned itself into the memories of men so it became a birth-mark, and thus was handed down to generations.* None knew how kindled. It first flared westward of the shallow lake, where Mistassinni empties its brown waters from the north, and at the first flash flamed to the sky. It is a mystery to this day, for never did fire kindled in woods or grass run as it ran. It raced a race of death with every living thing ahead of it, and won against the swiftest foot of man or moose. The whirring partridge, buzzing on for life, tumbled, featherless, a lump of singed, palpitating flesh, into the ashes. The eagle, circling a mile from earth, caught in the rising vortex of hot air, shrunk like a feather touched by heat, and, lessening as he dropped, reached earth a cinder. The living

---

* It has been told me that many children born after the terrible conflagration that had swept the forests from west of Lake St. John to Chicoutimi, and which ran a course of 150 miles in less than seven hours, were marked, at birth, as with fire.

were cremated as they crouched in terror or fled screaming. The woods were hot as hell. Trees, wet mosses, sodden mould, brooks, springs, and even rivers, disappeared. Rocks cracked like cannon overcharged. The face of cliffs slid downward or fell off with crashes like split thunder. It was a fire as hot, as fierce, as those persistent flames which melt the solid core of the world.

Downward they raced in equal flight. Her foot was as the fawn's; his stride like that of moose. She bounded on. He swept along, o'er all. They spake no word save once. She slipped. He plucked her from the ground, and said: "Brave one, we'll win this race—speed on." She flashed a bright look back to him and flew faster. Thus, over boulders and round rocks, they sprang and ran. Above, the flying sheets of flame; behind, the red consuming line; around them, the horrid crackling of shriveling leaves; ahead, the water, nigh to which they were; when, suddenly, they ran into blinding smoke and lost the trail, and, tearing onward, without sight, she fell and, striking a sharp rock, lay still, numbed to weakness. The Trapper, stumbling after, fell prone beside her, but his strong frame stood the shock, and staggered upward. He felt for her, and found her limp. She knew his touch and murmured faintly, with clear tones: "Dear love, stay not for me: go on and live. Atla knows how to die."

He snatched her to his breast and through his teeth, "O God! have you no mercy?" then plunged onward, running slanting upward, for the smoke was thick below, and he knew the trees grew stunted on the cliffs. He ran like madman. A saint running out of hell might not run swifter. He was in hell, the hell of fire; with heaven, the heaven of cool, reviving water, just ahead. The strength of ten was in him, and it sent his body, with her body on his breast, onward like a ball. His hair crimped to the black roots of it. He felt it not. His skin blistered on cheek and hands. He only strained her closer to his bosom and tore on. With garments blazing, he whirled onward up the slope, streamed like a burning arrow along the ridge which edges the monstrous rock men call Cape Trinity, slid, tumbled, fell, down its smoking slope, until he came to where the awful front drops sheer; then, heaving up his huge frame, still clasping her sweet weight within strong arms, plunged, like a burnt log rolling out of fire, into the dark, deep, blessed tide.

Morn came, but brought no sunrise. Smoke, black and dense, filled the great gorge, and hung pulseless over the charred mountains. Soot scummed the water levels, and new brooks, flowing in new channels, tasted like lye. Smells of a burnt world filled the air. The nose shrank from breath, and breathed expectant of offense. The fire brought death to ten thousand living things, and filled all the waste with stench of shallow graves, burnt skins, and smoldering bones.

The dead had saved the living, for the old chief lived. From the red beach he saw the Trapper's race for life along the smoking ridge, and paddled quick to where he made his awful, headlong plunge into Eternity.* From the deep depths the Trapper rose, like a dead fish to surface, his breath beaten out of him, but clasping still in tight arms the muffled form. His tongueless saviour — so paying life with life, the old debt wiped out at last — towed him to shore and on the beach revived him with rude skill persistent. He came to sense with violence, torn convulsively. His soul woke facing backward, living past life again. To feet he sprang at his first breath, and cried: "Awake! awake! my God, the fire is on us, Atla!" then plucked her from the sand where she lay, weak as a wilted flower, and started with a bound to fly. The touch of her bent form, drooping in his arms, recalled his soul to sense, and he knew all, and reeled with the woe of it. Down at the water's edge he sank, cast covering cloth from head and hands, bathed her dark face, and murmured loving words to her still soul.

---

*The recess of water curving inward toward the mountains between Cape Trinity and Eternity is called Eternity Bay.

Through realms and spaces of deep trance her spirit, lingering in dim void 'twixt life and death, heard love's call, and struggled back toward the shore of life and sense. From pulseless breast her soul clomb up, pushed the fringed lids apart, and gazed, through wide eyes of sweet surprise, upon his worshiped face: then sank, leaving a smile upon her lips, within the safe inclosure of deep sleep. All day she slept within his arms. All night she slumbered on. Wisely he waited, saying: "Sleep to the overtaxed means life. It is the only medicine, and sure. In sleep the wearied find new selves."

But when the second morning after starless night came to the world, she felt the waking gray of it upon her lids, and, stirring in his arms, like wounded bird in nest, moved mouth and opened eyes, and gazed slowly round, as seeking knowledge of place and time and circumstance. Then memory came, and she remembered all, and softly said: "Art thou alive, dear love? I have been with the dead. The dead were very kind, but oh, I missed you so," and with soft hand she stroked his face caressingly. The old chief mutely stood, watching, with gloomy eyes, the sad sight. He read the motion of her lips, and in his tongueless throat there grew a moan, and his dry lids wet themselves with tears. She noticed him and said: "You, too, alive, old servitor! The gods are strict, but merciful. Two of the three remain. The one alone must go. So is it well." Then to her worshiped one: "Dear love, this is a gloomy place. Let us go on. The smoke hides the bright world. I long for light. The fate is not yet sure. The blood of our old race holds tightly to last chance. We face it out with death to the last throb. Then yield, not sooner. Who knows? I may find sunrise yet at Mamelons."

So was it done.

They placed her on soft skins within the boat facing him who steered, for she said: "Dear love, the dead see not the living. If I go I may not see you evermore. So let me look on your dear face while yet I may. To-day is mine. To-morrow — I know not who may own to-morrow."

Thus, he at stern and she at stem, softly placed on the piled skins, her dark eyes on his face, they glided out of the deep bay, round the gray base of the dread cape that stands eternal, and floated downward with the black ebb toward the sea. Past islands and through channels intricate, they went in silence, until they came to where the Marguerite, with tuneful mouth, runs singing over shining sands, pouring out into dark Saguenay, as life pours into death; then breathed they freer airs, and the freshness of untainted winds fell sweetly down upon them from overhanging hills, and thus she spake: —

"Dear love, I know not what may be. We mortals are not sure of anything. The end of sense is that of knowledge. We know we live forever. For so our pride compels, and some have seen the dead moving. But under what conditions we do live beyond, we know not.

Hence hate I death. It is an interruption and a stoppage of plans and joys which work and flow in sequence; severs us from loved connections; for the certain gives us the uncertain, and in place of solid, substantial facts forces us to build our future lives on the unfixed and changeful foundations of hopes and dreams. It is not moral state that puzzles. We of the old race never worried over that. For we knew if we were good enough to live here, and once, then we were good enough to live elsewhere and forever; but it was the nature of existence, its environment, and the connections growing out of these that filled the race whose child I am with dread and dole. For all the women of my race loved with great loves — the loves of lovers who sublimated life in loving, and knew no higher and no holier, nor cared to know. We cast all on that one chance; winning all in winning, and losing all if we lost. With me it is the same. I love you with a love that maketh life. I am a slave to it. It is my strength or weakness, as has been with the women of my blood from the beginning. I have no other creed, nor faith, nor hope. To-day I see thee, and I have. To-morrow whom shall I see? The dead? I care not for the dead.

There is not one among them I may love, for loving thee has cut me off from loving other one forever; unless the alchemy of death works back the creative process, undoing all of blood and nature, and sends us into nothingness, then brings us forth by new processes foreign to what we were, and wholly different from our old selves, which is a consummation horrible to think of."

"Nay, nay," exclaimed the Trapper. "Such cannot be. Our loves, if they be large and whole, grow with us, and with our lives live on forever."

"It may be so, dear love," replied the girl. "Love's prophecy should be true as sweet, or else your sacred books are vain. For in them it is written, 'Love is of God.' But oh, how shall I find thee in that other world? For wide and dim must stretch its spaces, and vast must be its intervals. This earth is small. We who live on it, few. Within the circle of three generations all living stand. But the dead are many. The sands of Mamelons are not so numberless. They totalize the ages; the land they dwell in beyond mortal compass. Who may be sure of meeting anyone in such a realm? At what point on its boundaries shall I wait and watch? How signal thee, by hand or voice, when out of earth, like feather, blown, by that strange movement men call death, into the endless distances, thou comest suddenly. Alas! alas! I know not if beyond this day, I, going out of this dear sunlight, may ever and forever look upon thy face again!"

"Atla," returned the Trapper, "I know not what may be. But this I know and swear, that if a trail pushed, seeking, through a thousand or ten thousand years, may bring me to thy side, we two shall meet in heaven."

"Oh, love, say those sweet words again," she cried. "Say more than them. Crowd into this one day, that I am sure of, the vows and loves of half a life, that I may go, if go I must, out of thy sight from Mamelons, heartfelt, upheld by an immortal hope. And here I pledge thee, by the Sacred Fire that burns forever, that if power bestowed by nature, or artfully acquired by patience working through ten thousand years, may find thee after death, then some time will I find my heaven in thy arms, not found till then. So, now, in holy covenant we will rest until we come to Mamelons, and ever after. I feel the breeze of wider water on my cheek, and breathe the salted air. I shall know soon if ever sunrise shine for me at Mamelons."

So went they down in silence with the tide that whirled itself in eddies toward the sea; past L'Anse a l'Eau, where now the salmon swim and spawn against their will,* past the sharp point of rounded rocks, where sportively the white whales† roll, and, steering straight across the harbor's mouth, where her Basque fathers anchored ships before the years of men,‡ ran boat ashore where the great ledge runs, sloping down from upper sand to water, and shining beach and gray rock meet.

But as they crossed the harbor's mouth, sail-

---

* At L'Anse a l'Eau, where the Saguenay steamers land passengers for Tadousac, the tourist will find a fine collection of large salmon at the upper end of the little bay or recess, for here is one of the salmon-hatching stations under government patronage.

† The white whales, commonly called porpoises, are very plentiful at the mouth of the Saguenay, and to a stranger present a very novel and entertaining spectacle tumbling in the black water. They are hunted by the natives for both their skins and oil.

‡ Personally, I hold to the opinion that the eastern hemisphere never lost its knowledge of the western, but that from immemorial times, the Basques and their Iberian ancestors visited at regular intervals the St. Lawrence, both gulf and river. Of course, the grounds on which I base such an opinion cannot be presented in this note.

ing straight on abreast of Mamelons, its bright sands blackened and a shadow darkened on its front, and, as they bore her tenderly to the terrace, where stood tent and priest, a tremor shook the quivering earth, and through the darkening air a wave of thunder rolled.

“Dear love,” she said, “it may not be. The fate still holds. The doom works out its dole. I may not be thy wife this side grave. What rights I have beyond I shall know soon. For soon the sight * will come to me, and what is hidden now will stand out plain.” Then, lying on the skins, she gazed at Mamelons, looming vast and black in shadow, and, closing eyes, she prayed unto the gods, the earthborn, old-time fathers of her race.

But he could not have it so, and when prayer was ended said: “Atla, we have come far for marriage rite, and married we will be. Thou art mistaken. I have seen shadow settle and

---

* It is held by some that certain families have the power of “second sight,” or to look into the future, come to them just before death. I have known cases where such power, apparently, did come to the dying. The Basque people held strongly to the belief that all of their kingly line were seers or prophets, and that, especially before dying, each had a full, clear view of the future.

heard thunder roll before. In eye nor cheek are death's pale signals set. The holy man is here. Here ring and seal. Forget the doom, and let the words be read that bindeth to the grave."

To this she answering said: "Dear love, thou art in error, but thy word is law. My stay is brief. When yonder shadow passes I shall pass. There sleeps my father, and with him I must sleep. The earth is conscious. I am of those who were earthborn, and so she feels our coming and our going as mother feels life and death of child. The sun is on the western hills. At sunset I shall die. But if it may stay up thy soul through the sad years, bid the good man go on."

Then took the priest his book, and, in the language of the Latins, so old to us, so new beside her tongue, whose literature was dead a thousand years before Rome was, began to bind, by the manufactured custom of modern men, whose binding is of law and not of love, and hence a mockery. But ere he came to that sweet fragment of love's law and faith, stolen from the past, the giving and receiving of a ring, symbol of eternity, she suddenly lifted hand and said: —

"Have done! have done! No need of marriage now. No need of rite, nor prayer, nor endless ring, nor seal of sacred sign. I see what is to be. The veil is lifted and I see beyond. I see the millions of my race lift over Mamelons. They come as come the seas toward shore, rolling in countless billows from central ocean. The old Iberian race, millions on millions, landscapes of moving forms, aligned with the horizon, come, marching on. Among them, lifted high, the gods. On thrones a thousand queens sit regnant, raimented like me. Their voice is as the sound of many waters:—

“ ‘Last, best, and highest over all, we place thee.’

“The gods say that? So be it, then. Mother, I have kept charge. My love has won him. The old race stops, but by no fault of mine. My people, this man is king to me. See that ye bring him to my throne when he comes seeking to the West. My lord, Fate now controls and I must pass. But passing on I leave my soul with thee. Make grave for me on Mamelons. Put lily at my throat, green boughs on breast, bright sand on boughs. Watch with me there one night. I will be there with thee. So keep with Atla holy tryst one night and only one — then go thy way. We two will have sweet meeting after many days." And saying this she put soft hand in his and died. Her lover, kneeling by her couch, put face to her cold cheek, nor stirred. The holy man said softly holy prayer; while the old tongueless chief of Mistassinni wrapped head in blanket, and through the long night sat as one dead.

Next day the silent man made silent grave on Mamelons. At sunset they brought her to it, raimented like a queen, and laid her body in bright sand; put lily at her throat, green boughs on peaceful breast, and slowly sifted clean sand over all.

That night a lonely man sat by a lonely grave, through the long watches keeping holy tryst. But when the sun came up, rising out of mists which whitened over Anticosti, he rose, and, standing with bared head, he said: —

"Atla,* we two will have sweet meeting after many days." Then went his way.

---

*I named my heroine Atla, because I hold that the Basques not only are descendants of the old Iberians, but that the Iberians were a colony from Atlantis. I accept fully Ignatius Donnelly's conclusions as to the actual old-time existence of a great island continent in the Atlantic Ocean, and believe that in it the human race began and developed a civilization incon-

And there, on that high crest, whose sands first saw the sunrise of the world, when sang the stars of morning, beyond doom and fate, at last, the child of the old race, which lived in the beginning, sweetly sleeps at Mamelons.

---

ceivably perfect and splendid, of which the Egyptian, Peruvian, Iberian, and Mexican were only colonial repetitions. Atla is, therefore, the proper name for the last of the old Basque-Iberian blood to have, as it is the root of Atlantis (Atla-ntis), the original motherland of all. I have never met Mr. Donnelly, and may never meet him, and hence I make this opportunity to express the obligation I am under to him for entertainment and profit. The patience of the scholarship that could accumulate the material for a book like his "Atlantis" is worthy of a wider and more grateful acknowledgment than this superficial age of ours is able to give, for it cannot appreciate it. No man with any pretensions of scholarly attainments can afford to let "Atlantis" go unread.

END.

UNGAVA.

UNGAVA.*

A COMPANION IDYL OF MAMELONS.

---

CHAPTER I.

AFTER MAMELONS.†

THUS did the Doom of Mamelons work out its dole. And leaving in her grave the joy of all his life, the fairest, sweetest woman of her race, — whose women were the glory of the world, — down from the Mound of Fate the Trapper came with heavy step and slow, as one who bears a burden greater than his strength, to where the tongueless chief of Mistassinni stood beside his bark, his silent paddle in his hand, and to him slowly said:—

---

* Accent on second syllable.

† Ungava is not in the true sense a sequel of "The Doom of Mamelons," for that tale stands complete in itself. Nevertheless, the two are closely connected, and structurally united in a close companionship, as two of the principal characters in Mamelons — the Trapper and the old chief of Mistassinni — are leading ones in this story, and in it are necessarily many allusions which are more plain and enjoyable to the reader if he has previously read Mamelons.

“Old friend, in yonder sand my love lies dead. You helped me lay her lovely body down, where it must lie beyond the reach of loving hands forever. There, as she bade, I have kept holy tryst one night. She met me there. To that high crest where first the world was born, from silence and from starlight she came down and stood beside me. I saw her clothed in raiment like a queen, and all her beauty riper grown stood stately in her form, and shone resplendent out of face and eye. She told me things to be. And, as she talked, I heard the stir of thousands round her, and through the starlit air above the sands approving murmurs run; but long and lonely stretch the years 'twixt this and hour of meeting. Empty are my arms of that warm life that should be nestling in them, and empty all the world. With eyes uplifted unto mine, upon my breast her mother died. The Chief I loved is dead. And now she, too, is gone, and with her took in going all the sunshine of the world. You, now, and I are left alone. Two silent ones, for you are tongueless, and I with grief am dumb. We two are joined in brotherhood of woe. So in this bark of thine will you and I take seat, and you with silent blade shall steer it upward on the flooding tide of death-dark water,* colored like our grief, between the awful cliffs, which, leafless as our lives will be, have stood in dead, gray barrenness from the foundation of the world. So, now, old friend, from this dread shore of Fate push off, and we will go, I know not whither and I care not where. We two alone are left, and till death parts us will we bide together."

So was it done. Slowly, without word or sign, the old chief lifted paddle and silently the light boat moved from that dread shore which for a thousand years had been the shore of fate, and through the whirling eddies, whirling strongly up and on the flooding waters black as their grief between the monstrous walls of rock the silent two went floating up into the silence of unknown hap and hazard.

All day they drifted on in silence, until they came to where the Marguerite flows crystal over shining sands. Then through the current, flow-

---

* The waters of the Saguenay are dark and gloomy to a degree unknown in any other river or body of water I have ever seen, and are noted, the world over, because of their peculiar somber and sinister appearance. Looked at from above, they often seem to be as black as ink.

ing swift and clear, with skillful stroke the old, dumb helmsman pushed it upward through the eddying tide until he reached that lovely bend where silver birches grow, and where a spring pours down its wimpling line of liquid music, singing through the grasses, until it, laughing, runs into the smiling river. Then, standing on the strand, he to his stricken comrade said: * —

“ Listen, Trapper, to wisdom born of losses many and of many years. At Mamelons your love lies dead. Your thoughts are heavy and your heart is sore. The wounds of death are deep. Time is the only balm that heals its hurts, and change. These two salve all and heal at last, if ever. The island is no place for you or me. There sleeps her mother and there sleeps the

---

* The reader must bear in mind that the language of pantomime, or sign language, has been brought to a wonderful perfection as a means of communicating thought among the Indians of this continent. The ancient Greeks, as is known to all scholars, found it adequate for the purpose of full dramatic expression, whether of comedy or tragedy. They did not originate it, but borrowed it from older races and ages. The reading of the motion of the lips is also an ancient accomplishment, if such a word is allowable in connection with such an art or practice. Nor is it nearly as difficult as one might imagine to follow the pantomimist, and catch the sense of even subtle shades of expression. Some have thought that it is the earliest, as it certainly is the most vivid and picturesque, method of imparting human thought.

Chief. The house is empty as a nest when birds have flown and under snow the bough droops down. There will thy grief keep fresh and sore. Its ache will grow as grows thy sense of loss. Here will we camp to-night, and on the morrow northward will we go to far Ungava.* Upon its sands and ice, in distant years, I fought and hunted. There, perchance, I may find some, who, scarred in those old fights and gray, remember me. If not, it is the same. Among the Nasquapees is one who knoweth all. He can call up the dead.† His eyes see backward and before. There is but one thing I would know. It may be he can tell it me. Here will we sleep to-night. Perchance in sleep some dream ‡ may * Ungava is the name of a large bay which runs deeply into the body of the continent near the northeast corner of the Labrador peninsula. It is remarkable because of its extraordinary tides, which rise to the height of sixty feet and more. Around it, formerly, the famous tribe of Nasquapee Indians—if they be Indians—had their home. Of these remarkable people I have spoken in my note concerning them in Mamelons.

---

† This is an allusion to a famous prophet or high priest of the tribe, who, apparently, was the last of a long line of prophets, who claimed to have powers such as the Witch of Endor possessed and exercised, when, if our Old Scriptures are to be credited, she called up the spirit of Samuel from the dead.

‡ As is well known, the Indian is a firm believer in dreams as a method of mystic and valuable communication. From this come. If not forbid, to-morrow northward we will go."

To which the Trapper : —

"Old chief, your years are many and your words are wise. The wounds of death are deep, and time and change and God's sure help can only heal. The island is an empty nest. The fairest and the sweetest bird these northern woods may ever know, has flown. She has found summer land. She will come back no more. The island is the home of graves. Some things are there for me to do. But they can wait. His kinsmen watch the house, and they are true. When out of years I have, by many sights and deeds and varying haps, carved calmness, and been strengthened, I will go back. I will not go till then. I will go north with thee, and hear the roaring of Ungava's tides, and hunt the seals beneath the fires that burn the end of the world.* It may be that in action old-time superstition no reasoning can turn him. He sincerely believes that the Great Spirit speaks directly to him in his sleep by their agency.

---

* The northern Indians will gravely inform you that what we call the Aurora Borealis, or Northern Lights, are the reflection of flames which ever and anon rush out from the end of the world, which they hold to be forever in a state of combustion.

swift my soul will find its rest, and out of changeful chance forgetfulness will come, and scab the gash of grief now bleeding red, and scar it to dull pain. We will go north, and bide together till we die." So was it done.

So went they northward, and for half a year did widely roam. They passed the sources of the streams that flow toward the south. They saw the forests dwindle down until the mighty pine was but a shrub. They visited old fields, where, in forgotten years old fights had been, whose only record was scattered and white bones. They made them bags of eider* and housed themselves in snow. They trapped them furs which gave them garments such as princes wear. They fed on meat of fish and fowl and animal, juicy and fat, cooked with a hunter's art. For bread they digged them roots, which, deftly parched and pounded, yielded substance sweeter than the wheaten loaf. So roamed they through the north, through those wild wastes where trails are scarce as honor among men. One, seeking day and chance, if they still waited; the other, balm for wounds within, and that forgetfulness which dulls the edge of pain and makes it easier to be borne. So, leisurely they drew their trail into the north as men who seek at random, or seek forgetfulness of selves: — that sweet oblivion or dim memory of woes.

---

* The Nasquapee Indians sleep in bags lined with eider-down.

So roamed they on. One night they camped beneath a hill, one of a range that stretched a hundred miles from east to west: a ridge of mighty boulders, meteoric stones, and rocks volcanic, treeless, soilless, a monstrous jumble of chaotic débris that might be monument above a ruined world.* There in wild labyrinth of desolation they made their bivouac. Before they slept, the old chief, standing in the camp-light, signed:—

“Trapper, some evil fate is coming swift as death. Twice on the trail to-day I felt the ledges shake.† I hear the sound of running noises underground. The fire to-night burned

---

* Nothing can be imagined more desolate and dismal than this section of the Labrador peninsula. If Ignatius Donnelly's theory is correct, that a comet once struck the earth near what is now the northern extremity of the globe, one might easily imagine that, west and north of Ungava, he was standing amid the ruins caused by the awful catastrophe.

† Earthquake shocks are not infrequent throughout this section. Some years the seismic disturbances are felt for months together, and scarcely a year passes that one or more shocks are not experienced.

blue, and talked. I smell a storm.* This is a wilderness of rocks. There is no trail. If sun should fail what eye might thread a passage through? I fear some fate is coming. What counsel do you give?"

To which the Trapper made reply:—

"Chief, lie down and sleep. The stars are bright. The sky is blue. No storm is coming. If it come, we will bide in our bags. Two days at most will blow it out. Our food will last till sun comes forth. The rocks are jumbled, and all look alike. Who cares? We are not boys. Can you and I lose trail? That were a joke. Your nose is not a hound's. No storm is coming. Lie down and sleep. Let ledges shake. Unless they shake me out of bag, I will sleep on." So spake he lightly, and, muttering in his throat, the old chief crept into his eider nest, and, like a duck within its warmth of feathers, the two men slept.

That night the dreaded storm came down and * Even many white hunters I have met in my wanderings have boldly claimed that the coming of great atmospheric disturbances was plainly interpreted by the nose. May it not be possible that the organs of smell, like those of sight, are much more acute in those who are "lone hermits of untainted woods" than in us who live from day of birth in smoky and foul atmospheres?

---

such a storm no man had ever seen in all the North. Nine days it blew. Nine nights its roar was on the hills of rocks piled high as broken trees. Nine sunless mornings came. The falling fleece turned darkest night to gray. From out the north chaotic whirlwinds rushed, whirling in screaming eddies onward. The upper stillness, which, woven by the gods in silent looms, is folded like a downy mantle round the world as vestment cast by slumber over weary beds, was torn in shrieking shreds and blown down the gale in strips of noise. The forest, like a man entombed alive, moaned, writhed, and roared, unseen. Hills into distance ran from sight. The streams stopped running and the lakes lay shivering, dumb and black, beneath the ice that was itself invisible. The world turned gray, and through the whirling, eddying fleece the lenses of the eye reflected only falling flakes. Chaos had come again and all the earth was without form and void.

Amid the storm whose fury blotted out the world, the two men, blinded, faint from hunger, wandered on. Each day they groped for shelter; each night, burrowed under snow, awaiting death. All skill was vain; all courage useless. They felt that they were doomed. Twice had the chief refused to move. Twice had he fixed his eyes on vacancy. And twice the death-song struggled in his tongueless throat. The Trapper would not yield. His heart was true as tested steel to bravest hand. It would not break nor bow to shock, however heavy. Twice had he rallied his old friend from trance for further effort, when, staggering onward round the sharp edge of a ledge, they slipped together and both fell through covering snow into a fissure yawning wide, and downward half a hundred feet they slid into a mighty cavern!

So, into shelter underground, through God's sweet mercy, had they dropped, when, blinded by the storm, and hunger-faint, they stumbled from the cliff and fell. The cliff, a rounded boulder nicely poised, had lost its balance as they fell, and, rolling after, lay on the shute through which they slid, huge and heavy as a hill.

Then spake the Trapper, as he staggered to his feet, grimly jesting in the face of death:—

“Here are we safely housed, old friend, at last! Never did mongrel cur, chased by she-wolf, skurry into kennel faster. I fell with legs so wide apart that all the hillside followed. Its cobbles pelted on my back as I slid downward. I'll strike a light and see if we have host to welcome lodgers."

Then he struck light and to the wick of a short candle placed it; and as it kindled into blaze he held it high above his head and in the light it gave the two men sought with earnest eyes the nature of the place, and whether it were home or grave.

It was an old-time cave. Home had it been and grave, for those whose deeds and death are prehistoric. In ages lost to memory of men, man had been there before. Fleeing from sudden heat that blasted, or dreadful cold succeeding heat, or from that awful monster* bursting out

---

* Many tribes of Red Men have among them the legend of a great catastrophe caused by a comet striking the earth. The story or myth of a "flying dragon, breathing fire and smoke," is found in all old literatures, and always connected with a vast ruin wrought on the earth. There is no reason, in the nature of things, why a collision should not occur between the earth and one of the many "monstrous and lawless wanderers of the skies." Nor is it inconceivable that such a collision in the remote past did occur. Assuming this to be true, many remarkable and now mysterious phenomena on the earth's surface could be easily explained. Kepler declared that "comets are scattered through the heavens with as much profusion as fishes in the ocean." Lalande had a list of seven hundred comets observed in his time. Arago estimated that the comets belonging to the

of distance into northern sky, nigh where the steadfast star now sentinels the heavens, and breathing fires in volume wider than the world, rushed, tearing downward toward the pole, struck the even earth head on and knocked it from its level poise, changing its course forever, so burying all in ruin : — hither to this deep cavern had he with his children wildly run, and, screaming, plunged into it, as men to-day running out of fire with garments blazing plunge headlong into saving wells.

There had he lived, there fed his hunger, worshiped God, wrought with his hands — and died. For, scattered here and there, were instruments of stone: a hatchet, flint heads for spears, and arrows sharpened with laborious pains. Brands, too, were there, which once had glowed with fire for human need,—charred proofs of tribes and primal things, which any careless foot may spurn as worthless, and yet be solar system, within the orbit of Neptune, number seventeen and a half millions. While Lambert says five hundred millions are a very moderate estimate. And this, be it remembered, does not include those that are constantly pouring in from the infinite spaces beyond the limits of the solar system. When the multitude of the comets is considered, the wonder is, not that one has struck the earth, but rather that, if I may so speak, the earth has managed to dodge them at all!

---

older than the Pyramids. Amid the dust the foot disturbed were teeth of men and animals that lived in the forgotten ages. Searching through an inner passage, seeking outlet, the Trapper found a knife of bronze lying on the floor, its handle resting in the dusty outline of a human hand, and wondered if the breast that felt it last had been of priest or victim. Who might say? Who might ever tell the secrets of that dread place and symbol? Here, penned with death, for many days they groped and sat in gloom. At last the Trapper, feeling that death was nigh, said suddenly, "Old friend, our time to say farewell has come." Then, for the last time lighted he the feeble wick, and, as it warmed, the small flame slowly grew until it globed with yellow light the central gloom. Then rose the chief of Mistassinni, cast robe of fur aside, and, grim, gray, and withered, stood forth to sight, and to the Trapper signed: —

"Trapper, we die a death of shame. We are not men. We are as hedgehogs in a hole, shut in by ice. Here shall we die and rot, and be no more forever,—never see light of day, nor breathe the upper air. I am a chief. Before the Esquimau tore out my tongue and ate it, my voice was heard in every battle fought through all the North, and where it sounded men knew Death was there, and shrank. Only the Chief * and you had fame so great. In feasts and dance, and when the stake † was struck, our names were linked together like three equal stars, and mothers of the Esquimaux hushed crying child with whispered mention of our awful fame. But dying here like starving hog in hole, I never more may see the lodges of my tribe ‡ nor sit in council with the chiefs among whom I am greatest. The battle will be set, and he I hate will live. And younger men will never know my fame. Do for me one more deed, far better than that one you did for me upon the ridge above the Saguenay when you did save me from the Esquimaux, and prove your love again. Draw now thy knife, and place its point betwixt the ribs that are above my heart, that I may lean

---

* Referring to the chief who was uncle to Atla. (See Mamelons.)

† The stake around which the war dance is danced, and into which each warrior strikes his hatchet, thus signifying his enlistment for the war.

‡ An Indian believes that if he is smothered underground, his spirit will remain buried with his body, and never reach the Spirit-land, viz., that he will miss the blessing of immortality.

upon it and die as warrior dies in battle under foeman's knife, and not be smothered like a hog in hole."

And from his shrunken shoulders, haughtily, his blanket did he cast, and posed himself above the burning wick whose dying flame began to waver, that friendship might do for him the deed he prayed for.

Then said the Trapper, speaking through the failing flashes of the light: —

"Never before, old chief, did friend in dying ask deed of me I did not do. But this I may not. I may not redden knife of mine with thy old blood. I am a man without a cross* and such a deed I am forbid. It is not fit. Your superstition is not true. Out of this cavern, filled with old-time bones, we two will go at death into free air: thou to the lodges of thy tribe; I to her throne.† Hunger has done its work, and we are weak. We will lie down and sleep as after battle, battle-tired. Sleeping, we soon shall pass to deeper sleep, and so to happy waking. Old friend, the light is going. Brief is our parting. Look. With its failing flash I give thee dying cheer, and bid thee long farewell." And with the word the light went out, and in the gloom of that old grave of prehistoric man the two men stood, lost to each other's sight forever.

---

*A pure-blooded white.

† Referring to his joining at death his beloved Atla, who, in dying [see Mamelons], beheld herself elected by the gods to sit on the "last and highest throne of herald race."

CHAPTER II.

THE COMING OF UNGAVA.

So stood the two in darkness and in silence, waiting death. The one with Indian patience grim and dumb; the other, brave, high-hearted, revolving many thoughts. When, suddenly, the pulseless air moved with vibrations. The awful silence grew sweetly vocal, and a voice, clear-toned as silver bell or flute, said, from afar: —

“ Who speaks of dying and of shameful death? Whose voice bids friend the long farewell, and gives him dying cheer? No death is here, nor dying. Ungava comes! ” And in the distant gloom, far down the caverned corridor, shone out a star, pure white, intense, illuminating all, and in its dazzling radiance, clothed in white fur from head to foot, a wand within her hand uplifted high, whose point burned unconsumed, with face of snow, and eyes and hair of night’s jet hue, floating on as vision seen in dream, there came — a girl!

So in the white light stood the three, and on the one the two did gaze with eyes that grew with wonder. No greater change might there have been had angel of the Lord descended to that cave to summon dust and bone of dead humanity to glorious resurrection. Then, rallying from first shock of vast surprise, the Trapper, awe-struck, said: —

“Shadow or substance. Spirit or flesh. I know not which, strange vision, but by the living God I know that never unto man in deeper need did he send saving angel. Who art thou, thou who bearest name of wildest shore on the round earth, and of what world? Speak message out, and tell thy tale; for whether I be quick or dead, I know not as I look on thee.”

Then, clear as bell or flute in evening air of summer, came the words, filling all the cave with sweetness like a song sung by unseen singer: —

“Trapper, thou art known to me, for I have seen thee when a thousand miles divided. Amid the smoke of battle have I seen thee move when death went with thee, step for step. Asleep, at night, beneath the pines or at the base of rocks in strange wild places in the woods, above thee, sleeping, have I stood and warded evil from thee. Wild beasts and wilder men with nose of hunger and with eyes of hate, have I turned or frightened from thy couch, and in the morning thou didst wake refreshed and safe, as one who knows not he is guarded. I am a spirit. This mortal frame I use, but am not of it. I am thy angel. Before His face that is forever veiled, I stand forever pleading. For every soul born into flesh has guardian spirit. Thine am I, and I have come in hour of need to save. Great service do I thee. Great service must thou do in turn for me. Here hast thou wandered into realms where, mid the ruins of a world collapsed, the arts and mysteries of that ruined world live on.* My soul is thine. Thy soul is mine. We two are knit forever. So much I tell thee now. The rest shall be revealed as time moves on. My grandsire, after flesh, is Prophet of the North. He, child of the White God. This old

---

* The prophet of the Nasquapee tribe or race — I incline to the view that they are originally of a different racial stock than the red Indian — held that the world had been wrecked by a vast and far-reaching catastrophe, and his race — all save a small remnant — destroyed by it. He also held that that old race, thus destroyed, was the custodian of arts and powers, mysterious and potent on dead and living alike, and that these had been originally taught them by "the gods"; viz., superior beings, who had come from some other sphere, bringing with them knowledge and powers "too high for mortal minds." And that this fearful knowledge had been continued in his line, or caste, and was known to him.

chief knows my line, and therefore me. At Mistassinni did that line begin. At Mistassinni will it end. For he and I must sleep where his and my ancestors sleep, in that old cave where sound in constant council voices of the dead and spirit murmurings." *

Then to the chief she said:—

“ Old Chief, above thy head a hundred years have rolled. Look with the eyes of many days. Behold, the first and last am I. Thou knowest fate, and its old voice. For, when the first White God didst come from out of sea in boat not built by man, and, on the beach all wet and foul with brine and sand, was found by thy old sire, who then was boy, the prophet of your

---

* There is at Mistassinni a celebrated cave, which is regarded by the Indians with the utmost reverence, awe, and fear. Not one of them will ever look at it to this day in passing. The reason of this profound feeling seems to be found in their superstitious conviction that, from remote time, their dead chiefs were buried in it, as were also their prophets or sorcerers. It seems to have been the sepulcher of ancient days and people, for it has not been so used for a long time. They believe that the spirits of the dead hold their councils there, and that ghostly debate is constantly going on within its great chamber. I cannot ascertain that anyone has ever actually visited this celebrated cavern, or has any accurate knowledge of its size or appearance. All that is known of it is that it was once the place of sepulcher, and is regarded with utmost fear and veneration by all the tribes of the North.

tribe did say, 'When girl is born instead of boy, the White Gods die.' Last Chief of Mistassinni, here amid the ancient dead, the daughter of the White Ones, doomed like thee to end the line of glory, brings life and gives thee greeting."

Then did the grim old Chief do mystic deed. There, standing naked to his waist, the Totem of his tribe in red upon his breast, he lifted hands of plainest pantomime. Thrice did he wheel the sun around the earth in stately motion. Then strung his bow, and from his quiver four arrows drew, and, breaking pointed heads, he shot the harmless bolts to south and north, to east and west. So saying, "Thy reign is one of peace, and over all the earth." Then from his head the horned band he took — that symbol of old sovereignty, older than earliest throne,* — and from his wrinkled neck the string of savage

---

* Horns, as symbolic of power and sovereignty, are, literally, older than thrones. Like the Cross — the old-time symbol of joy and plenty — they run backward in time beyond all interrogation. When or how the symbolic significance first arose, no one may ascertain. If there was no other evidence, the horns of the bison on the head-band of an Indian chief — for none save chiefs of the highest rank can wear them — would prove that the red men of this continent belong to the primeval races. As the Trapper would say, "That is a sign that cannot lie!"

claws,* won in chanceful battle with the polar bear whose lightest blow is death, — a necklace whose every pearl had come at risk of life, — and laid them at her feet. Then on his withered breast he signed the sacred sign, and in solemn pantomime took goblet filled with water and poured † it on the ground. Then stately stood, and signed : — “Child of the Gods that were as snow !

Daughter of Power and Mystery ! Queen of Spirit-land, whose coming in the flesh before I died, and going with me to the grave, was told a

---

*The string of bear's claws round the neck of a chief is the highest possible proof of his skill, courage, and rank, since every claw in the necklace must have been taken from a bear that he with his own hand — unassisted by any — had killed. When it is remembered that the Indian had no weapon save his arrows, his hatchet, and his spear, some idea of the strength and courage required to secure such savage trophies can be formed. It takes a man of supremest nerve and courage to face a grizzly or polar bear with a Winchester to-day. What, then, must be thought of the stout-heartedness of one who, alone, and armed only with such feeble weapons as the native Indian had, would bravely attack these monstrous animals ? Verily, no braver race of men ever lived than the red Indian of this continent.

† The Indians of the Labrador peninsula present to the student of their habits and customs the curious spectacle of being both Christian and pagan, and in an equal measure. They will receive absolution at the hands of the priest, and the next instant engage with equal sincerity in an act of superstitious worship.

hundred years ago when I was born! Ungava! I, Chief of ancient times, about to die, salute thee! For, the same Voice that spoke thy fate, above me, sleeping in my father's tent, did say, 'This boy, a chief to be, — the last and greatest of his line, — shall die in battle with his foe upon the sands of wild Ungava, when from the White Gods shall be born a girl that bears its name.' So art thou known to me, and so I know my foe still lives, and day and chance will come. Trapper, 'tis well thy knife stayed in its sheath, for now I know I shall not die like hog in hole, but like a warrior on the bloody field, with sound of battle in my ears, my foe beside me, and the dead in heaps around. So, like a chief, shall I take trail that leads me into Spirit-land."

Then, after pause, the Trapper spake:—

"Ungava, such boastful words are vain, and vain this pantomime of worship. The light of heaven never will he see, nor foe, nor battle red. Here are we penned with death. Through veins that never shrank before, a chill creeps on, and all my frame is weakened of its power. If thou art able, lead me from this dreadful place filled with the smell of graves and dust of mouldered men, to where my eyes can see the sun once more and to my nostrils come the wind that bloweth strong and pure; and, whether thou be witch or woman, soul or flesh, a living sweetness or the mate of death, to me thou shalt be angel evermore."

So spake the Trapper with clear tones. To him Ungava listened as wanderer listens to sweet song sung by familiar voice through dewy air to him home-coming: — a song that tells of love and home and peaceful days that have been his, and shall be his again forever. Then to him said:—

"Fear not. Thou shalt see sun again. Upon thy face shall blow the wind that bloweth strong and pure. I am the queen of under and of upper world. The earth is hollow, and its outer shell is cracked with passages like the ice. I know them all. They are blazed trails to me. At touch of mine they flame with light far brighter than the sun. I know the under ways,—a labyrinth of passages which are to others endless as those tangled circles where the wicked dead go wandering, vainly seeking end of doom and the warm light of upper world, whose loves and light they forfeited by evil deeds. Through these I will guide safely on to where my grandsire sits whose eyes have seen the coming and the going of three times fifty years; who knows the arts and mysteries of lost worlds and ages, and has power on dead and living. Nor fear the chill that bringeth death, nor that dread weakening which has shriveled up the full-veined strength that in thy frame was born, that I have seen go forth in battle mightily, until I veiled my eyes in horror at the redness of thy path amid the bodies, even as my soul, admiring, leaped, glorying in thy power. Here in this vial, cut from crystal under pole, where, vibrant, quick with living sparks, glows that electric force which is of Him nor man nor spirit ever saw, who rules the universe He made, and is forever making by laws that work forever,—the great I AM,—is vital liquid, which, were you dying and one drop was laid upon your tongue, you would rise up strong as a giant. Thus with my finger, moistened with this living essence, I wet thy bloodless lips. And thine, old withered Chief; and bid ye follow me. Twice twenty leagues we go through warm and cold, this way and that, through crust of earth cracked into fissures when the fire-breathing Dragon * of the North, whose tail was wider than the world, struck it head on, until we come to where my grandsire waits to show us, ere he dies, things that were and things that are to be. Come on! Come on! I am thy angel, Trapper! Follow thou the light that burns because I will it! Follow me, and fear not! I am Ungava!"

---

* The breadth of the tail of the great comet of 1811, at its widest part, was nearly fourteen millions of miles; the length of

---

it, one hundred and sixteen millions of miles. The earth, remember, is only seven thousand nine hundred and forty-five miles wide. If the tail of such a comet as that of 1811 should sweep over our globe, it would not be large enough to make a bullet hole in it!

CHAPTER III.

UNGAVA'S LOVE.

“HERE are we come at last. Here, safely guided, I have brought you through the underways of earth: — the cracks and fissures in her solid crust, made in the ages of forgotten time, when out of distances beyond her orbit fell the bolt of ruin* that did rive apart the underlying granite. Past lakes of boiling water, hot with

---

* It is a remarkable fact, and extremely suggestive, that a belief existed among the Indian tribes of the American continent that the earth was once struck by a vast physical body coming suddenly and at tremendous speed out of space, which caused an enormous ruin. We find this legend or old-time faith among the Aztecs, the Pueblo Indians, the Mandans, the Dacotahs or Siouxs, the Chicasaws or Creeks, and all the many branches of the Algonquin family. With more or less difference in descriptive details, as would naturally be expected, the great fact is the same in each tribe or race. With this legend are blended other ones of cave life, and the loss and renewal of the seasons, of day and night, and of vast climatic changes which came to portions of the earth inhabited by their ancestors, as the result of this monstrous visitation. Back of all these legends in time, there must have been some fact as the originating cause. At least, so it would seem.

central heat;* on banks of rivers sulphur-edged and bottomed; past springs whose flames burn blue and white, yielding no smoke, and dreadful pits which vent the smothered fires where righteous ignorance believes are penned the damned; I, you have guided and brought safely on to sure retreat. Here, crystal, flow sweet waters. Here bread and meat await your hunger. On these piled skins and under eider blankets lighter than moonlit air, you can find blessed sleep. Eat, drink, and sleep. Fear not. Trapper, this light is of the day. The air you breathe has poured in currents past the stars. When food and sleep have made you strong again, Ungava will return, and, taking hand in hers, will lead you up where you shall see the orb that lights the world, and hear beneath the cliffs the tides come roaring in. Old Chief, sleep well and long. You shall find foe and chance, and out of glorious battle go like warrior to your sires. Eat, drink, and rest, while from my chamber nigh I sing the song that bringeth sleep and pleasant dreams."

---

* It is well known that in many of the deep, subterranean passages of the earth, especially in sections of the earth's surface subject to earthquake forces, the waters are hot, and some of the springs are, literally, of boiling water.

UNGAVA'S SONG.

I.

When men do sleep, their angels keep Love's watch where'er they be.
They plant or till, they sow or reap,
On mountain, plain, or sea.
They lose or win, they laugh or weep.
Who knows which it may be?
Sleep, Trapper, sleep. Dream, Trapper, dream.
There comes no harm to thee.

II.

Fair, fair is she, whose deep dark eyes
Gaze fondly down on thee.
Warm, warm her heart. Beyond the skies
She longing waits for thee.
Her bosom white, her eyes of night,
Are waiting there for thee.
Sleep, Trapper, sleep. Dream, Trapper, dream,
Of Heaven, and her, and — me!

III.

Mine, mine to keep. Hers, hers, to have.
So are we blessed three.
Soul of my soul. Heart of her heart.
I keep. She has. Ah, me!
The lots are drawn. The wheel stands still.
I keep. She has. Ah, me!
Sleep, Trapper, sleep. Dream, Trapper, dream,
Of Heaven, and her, and — me!

IV.

Before our birth our fates are fixed.
How may they altered be?
Why murmur, then? Why hope or wish?
Who can the end foresee?

If I lose life, I yet may find
The life I lose for thee.
Sleep, Trapper, sleep. Dream, Trapper, dream,
Of Heaven, and her, and — me !

V.

Sweet, sweet to one is duty done
When heart is ruled by will.
Sweet, sweet to know, as days go on,
That you preserve from ill.
I may not have, but I can keep.
So let the wheel stand still.
Sleep, Trapper, sleep. Dream, Trapper, dream,
Of Heaven, and her, and — me !

So slept they through long hours. Then, by the longing of her heart impelled, Ungava came to where the Trapper slept, eager to look upon his face again. So softly to his chamber did she steal, and standing over him still slumbering on, she said : —

“ He sleeps ! O sleep, rest lightly on him as the fur upon the sleeping ermine, when under its warm whiteness his little life reposes undisturbed. Be to his wearied frame as the cool water to the runner’s feet, when, hot and swollen, they have brought him safely to the end of perilous trail, foe-chased. Be to his soul as is that volatile oblivion with which the gods ease pain, to wounded warrior, that he may feel no more the wounds of grief, the pain of bruises got in fearful falls, or have his dreams disturbed by roar of dubious battle. O sleep ! sweet jailer of the soul, lock up his senses tight within his mighty breast ; stop ear so closely that no vagrant sound may steal into its vaulted vestibule and beat its vibrant drum. Seal down his heavy lids that no swift flash of light electric shall, with pointed lances, pry their edges open ; that I may gaze upon him undisturbed and question his unconscious soul, that, as the ancient oracles with lips of stone, not knowing what they said nor sensing joy or doom, so it may speak of fate and tell me if I live or die. Thrice round him will I walk that he in sacred circles three may be enfolded. Thrice over him, recumbent, the dust of dim forgetfulness I sift, that, through its drifts oblivious, he may not wish to rise. So sleeps he deep and well. Ah, me ! if to my senses there could come such blest oblivion !”

Long stood she then and gazed upon him as he lay asleep. Then walked away, hands clasped in doubt ; returned, and, standing over him, exclaimed : —

“ Oh, heart within, be still ! Rebellious bosom, cease, cease, to lift and sink tumultuous !

Be as the level sea when ebb is ended and the flood is stayed. And ye, pale sisters, gentle spirits of the skies, in whose sweet loving is no trace of mortal passion, help me who am earth-born, but doomed to be unto this man, or god, — I know not which, — a guard and guide forever ; to chill this mortal warmth within me into ice, lest love shall bring me woe and anguish evermore. Ah, me! ah, me! that I, a woman, should be doomed to look upon a man, like this! To see his soul pure as a child's; the gentleness of his spirit when unvexed; the might of hand which, single and alone, shapes battle ; the modesty of nature too humble to know its greatness ; and that old sense of truth which sweareth to its hurt and changeth not, keeping word and bond to lowliest given unto edge of death, — and be forbid to love him ! Did ever woman on the earth before have fate like this fall on her ! Oh, thou who didst weave fate for me, appear, appear, and tell the child of ancient days, if I do right or wrong to question destiny ! ”

Then, in reply, from out the gloom of farther distance, came a voice, saying : —

“ Ungava, light of face, but dark of soul,*

---

* Referring to her foreboding of coming doom.

fear not to question and to know. The Powers that work for thee are mighty. The threads that wove thy fate were mixed and tangled dubiously. Love cuts all knots, and love, perchance, may out of fate deliver. Child of the Past, the old gods love you, and, behold! Call up his soul and question freely. It shall speak truth oracular, and to his breast return not knowing."

Then, rallying courage for the deed, Ungava said: —

"So be it, then. I will call up his soul and know the truth. God! If from his soul, unconscious, I should learn that from his eyes one look of love would ever come to mine before I die! Such look would last me through eternity, and make my heaven a memory!" Then, proudly posed, with hand extended, grasping wand of power, she sang: —

"From out his breast where thou art hid,
O soul, come forth when thou art bid.
Prepare to leave thy home of sense,
And love shall be thy recompense.
For one brief moment rise and tell
The fate that makes my heaven or hell.
I fain would know what will befall.
So come, and answer love's sweet call.

“ Now, by the mother that did bear,
By powers of earth and powers of air,
By that sweet thing you most do love,
On earth below or heaven above.
By babe in cradle, corpse in grave,
And by this wand I now do wave
Above his sleeping breast, arise,
And here take form before my eyes.”

Then was such sight as mortal never saw.
Around the Trapper, as he slumbered on, a smoke as that of incense did arise, in color rosy-red, until it hid his sleeping form from sight of gazer;
and out of its enfolding came a voice, which said: —

“ I heard a voice I may not disobey call me from out this sleeping body that I animate, and which to me is as strong hand to the directing will. Why am I called before my time? Ungava, what wouldst thou know of me, or him?”

Then said Ungava: —

“ If ever I may have thee as mine own?”

To which the Voice replied: —

“ Yea, I am thine already. We two belong to him.”

Ungava: —

“ But I am woman. And a woman's wants are mine. Unless he loves, I must bear doom and dole. Oh, tell me, will he love me?"

To this, the Voice: —

"When in the cave which, but for thee, had been his grave, he swore if thou wouldst lead him forth where he might see the sun and breathe the air of heaven, thou shouldst be Angel to him evermore."

Ungava:—

"I know. I know his angel will I be. But will he love me?"

Again the Voice:—

"The woman that he loves must be a queen."

Ungava: —

"Queen! Queen am I. My throne is ancient as the Stars of Morning. Earth and air, past world and future, rule I. Speak once again. Shall I be Queen to him?"

To this the Voice made slow and solemn answer:—

"If thou wouldst have him break his faith and be to word and bond untrue, living or dead, then mayst thou be his Queen."

Then slowly thin and thinner grew the smoke until it vanished, and in the chamber dim and dark Ungava stood above the Trapper, slumbering on.

“Break faith!” she slowly said. “To word and bond, be, living or dead, untrue! O, soul, thou didst mistake if thou didst think a woman’s love would tempt the man she loved to such a deed. This man is honest. Such other one there may not be to-day on earth. Within his breast honor is as the breath is to his nostrils. Who, by the gift of all her heart, has paid the price and owns him, I know not. What woman of these later days when women have lost ancient beauty and are dwarfed from loyalty’s high port to fickleness, might with her little self pay queenly price, is past all credence. Nay, it must be false. Such woman lives not. The time has been when women in their beauty wedded gods, and immortality paid the price of death to win them, and, winning them, died happy in their arms. But that is past. From some old grave of porphyry or pearl, where she in sweet embalmment slept, had he the power to summon up the beauteous dead of olden time, some Queen, crowned and raimented in royalty, with all the fire and passion of her sex’s perfection in her blood, might have risen at his call, and, seeing him in battle or on the edge of death stand fearless, flung herself into his arms and claimed him for herself and for her throne. But now! It cannot be. There is no woman living fit for him. My power shall seek and find her. He has been cheated. My eyes shall see. If she be fit for him — alas! alas! I yield him to her arms, and yielding him I will lie down and die, and in the grave find — perhaps — forgetfulness! But if she be not fit; if she stand dwarfed beside him; if he were cheated by some accident of fate that came with tardy foot or ran too swift; if she be not as crown to kingly head; then will I win him to myself, and so be perfect angel in being perfect woman. But hush! He moves! Ah, what a sigh was that! I thought I was the only one that sighed. I will away, and come again when he awake.”

Then vanished she. As light retreats into the west at day's decline so glided she into the farther openings of the cave, still gazing backward as she faded into darker distance. The Trapper woke. His eyes moved in their sockets, seekingly, as one who, sleeping, has lost sense of place and time and circumstance; then memory came, and sitting half recumbent murmured he: — “Ungava! Atla! It was a dreadful dream!

As wild as chief e'er dreamed sleeping overtired on some old battle plain. I will arise and wash my heated face with cooling water. I would I knew where water runs that might this dreadful dream wash from my memory!"

Then in the ice-cold tide that ran in pleasant murmurs down the cavern's side he bathed his heated face and cooled the fever in his eyes, and, thus refreshed, stood gazing downward musing — when suddenly he stooped, and with observant eye studied the cavern's floor, and said: —

"By sacred sign on rifle stock* I swear that little imprint there was outlined by Ungava's foot! See! Heel and forefoot have left mark, but the arched interval between, too high and firm for weight to flatten, has left the dust unstirred. The saviour of my life did stand and watch me as I slept! Aye, she with face like purest snow, and gloomy soul as it were ever under shadow, and eyes that hold within their fringes, jet as night, the sorrow of a world long dead, who out of old-time grave and instant death did snatch me, did watch and ward keep over me in sleeping. What may I ever do to balance up the scales that now so heavily slope obliquely in her favor? She said great service must I do for her. I, standing in that dreadful tomb, chilled and weakened nigh to death, did give her word and bond if she should lead me to the upper world where I might see the sun once more and feel the air blow strongly on my cheek, she should be angel to me evermore. That word and bond thus given will I keep if hand or heart of mine may keep it this side death, or on beyond it. But, God of heaven, what is this? That impress in the polar fur where lay my head! If death were settling darkly in my eyes, through dying film and glaze well should I know that little trail. There stood Ungava. Here above my head did Atla stand. My God, that they, my saviour and my Love, should in this chamber stand together over me, and I sleep on! Am I on earth, or spirit-land? — What may this visitation mean?"

---

*Many of the rifles among the northern Indians and trappers, partly from priestly influence, perhaps, and partly from religious or superstitious motives personal to the owner, have the cross carved or painted on them.

Then as he musing stood Ungava came with noiseless step, and gliding to his side she gently said: —

"Trapper, twice has the sun come to the earth and gone since thou didst sleep, and now the moon shines whitely on the world. If thou art rested, we will go and thou shalt look upon her beauty and shalt hear the music of the sea which rolls its rhythm under sounding cliffs. What troubles thee? Hath not thy sleep been sound and restful?"

"Sound, sound it was in truth, O thou whose face is as the moon, my saviour and my angel: but, O Ungava, as I slept strange dreams did come!"

"Dreams?" said Ungava. "What dreams did vex thy sleep, may I not know?"

"Aye, aye," he cried, "thou shalt know all. For thou dost love me and art wise beyond the wisdom of dull, earthly man. Perchance thou canst the riddle read and tell me what the vision means."

Then calmly she: "Say on, and tell me all. No doubt I can the riddle read and give its meaning."

Then solemnly the Trapper said: —

"Ungava, listen. As I lay, my senses locked in slumber deep,—so deep I doubt if roar of coming battle would have stirred me,—forgetful of all earthly happenings as the dead: suddenly

I seemed to hear the sound of music coming through the air in strangest song by dead or living heard,—a song sung for my soul! In answer to that song my soul did leave my bosom and slowly rising stand, as a thing unseen, above me. Then voices did I hear. Questions that my ears could not retain were asked and answered. Some soul was seeking of my soul for knowledge which it would or could not give; and all the world around me was as are the heavens when the clouds above Ungava's torrent tides at sunrise roll upward rosy red. Then, suddenly, the voices ceased; my soul sank downward to its mortal home within my breast; the red clouds faded, and I knew no more until I woke. Spirit of knowledge, tell me, what was it I heard or seemed to hear? What is the meaning of this dreadful dream?"

Then said she, lightly, "Dear friend, thou wast o'er-tired. Thy body had been sorely taxed, and all thy senses tumbled into sleep as shot bear tumbles over edge of cliff and at the base dies struggling. It was a fever vision, an unreal distortion of the fancy; nothing more. Forget it."

Then did the Trapper, strongly moved, place hand upon her shoulder, and exclaim: —

“ Ungava, I can see some dread is on thee, and from fear of hurting me thou holdest back the truth. Thy soul is wiser than thy words. Look at that imprint in the film of dust upon the floor. There did my body lie. There at my feet thy foot did come and stand. Were I on dying bed, with dying gasp I'd swear that thy white moccasin didst make that imprint on the floor. That is not all. Angel of my life! saviour in hour of death! Look here, here in the snowy fur of this white polar's skin. See! see that footprint where a little foot did leave its telltale outline in the yielding hair! Whose foot made that? There at my feet, Ungava, as I slept, didst thou or thine own spirit stand. And here, by Him who made the world, were I at judgment bar, with hell before me, I would swear, upon this skin, seen or unseen by you, with arms outstretched above to shield or claim, did my sweet Atla stand! My God! what does it mean?”

Whiter than winding sheet her face beside his, gazing, grew. One hand clutched breast as if to tear it open. Back from her shoulder stretched her other arm, rigid and stiff. The hand was clinched in horror. Her widely opened eyes bulged wildly prominent — two orbs of black surprise. Then into air her white hands did she dash, and such a scream burst out of mouth as never shredded air before. And, hurling wand from quivering hand, she dashed from out the chamber as if upon her had come down, like bolt from heaven, an overwhelming fear or shame.

CHAPTER IV.

THE WIZARD OF THE NORTH.

IN his vast chamber, vaulted high, whose ledge-like sides were knobbed with metals, precious stones, gold, silver pale, pyrites of iron, garnets, blocked crystals, diamonds barbaric, stones of blood, and countless gems, and from whose dome stalactites pendent hung, sat the Great Wizard of the North. This caverned hall was Nature's marvel. It was as if some god before first day and night had been, when chaos ruled, and all the globe was soft as heated mud, with hands whose palms were wide as landscapes, had in wildest freak or wanton merriment, with strength gigantic, flung all metals known to forming nature down in showers, and laughed to see them fall into the stiffening ooze, which, hardening, held fast the treasure-trove of mighty mirth. Thus, when the cavern was by shock volcanic formed, its sides and vaulted roof, wide-spanned and high, were weighted with the wealth of empires. In this vast chamber thus adorned, rich in barbaric splendor, the Wizard of the North, her grandsire, Ancient of Days, whose stay on earth was thrice the length of mortal man's, sat in his awful chair—a seat of Power which had come down from primal days, huge and high, carved with weird shapes, bristling with polished horns whose every point shone like a star—on jet-black pavement placed, upon whose lustrous gloom was traced in gold the sacred circle of the Zodiac. His hair was white as whitened wool. His face was pale with years and thought and study of deep things. His eyes were living blackness. Above them brows of snow projected. On one thin hand there shone such stone as never man beheld, which flashed and glowed, changed color fitfully, then veiled its splendor in dull red, and slept. Anon its mystic fires would blaze again, and hot and hotter burn until they flamed the hand with splendor. Within the other hand, laid listless on his lap, was rod of that old mystic metal which to our modern ignorance is but a name, but once, with its strange powers, was known to men and had high use. In it were noises constant, as of snapping fire, and ever now and then a spark shot forth. Nor lacked it power to move and lift the hand that held it. It was strange rod. A living proof of ancient mystery which startled Egypt into justice, if sacred text be true.* Thus, in strange state and style, the mighty Wizard of the North, the weird embodiment of powers and arts and vital agencies beyond the ken of moderns, sat musing, lost within himself. Then opened he his mouth, and, as one holding audience with himself, he said:—

“I know not what it means! Thrice has the Rod stood upward in my listless palm, unmoved by me! Not for a hundred years has this old symbol on my hand, instinct with primal sense, burned with such fierce and fitful fires. Twice past me since I sat within this chair my ears have caught the sound of flitting feet. They came in haste, and, when they went, they flew. I felt, but could not see the presence pass. It must be so. One of that race which planted earth with power and beauty and high knowledge has drawn a line across the distances, so vast that light itself might never shaft the mighty intervals, and in this cave has come and gone!

---

* Exodus, vii. chap. 10, 11, 12.—“And Aaron cast down his rod before Pharaoh and before his servants, and it became a serpent. Then the magicians of Egypt cast down every man his rod, and they became serpents; but Aaron’s rod swallowed up their rods.”

There is not other one unless of that one race, in living-land or dead-land, my eyes might not behold in passing. Nor, of that race is one, unless she be of that old queenly line that lifted gods unto their throne, and by that graciousness did make them greater. But wherefore? What is there here for them or one of them, that she should leave her throne, which, were its glory tenfold brighter than the sun's, is yet so far removed from this small earth that not a point of light might tell its place or glory to a mortal's eye? What soul is here which through such space could send or call forth message? The chief of Mistassinni, withered and old, sleeps out of weakness unto strength, waiting for foe and chance. The Trapper, a vital man and primal in the greatness of his nature, but humble, and content with chase and hound and honest fight and mortal circumstance, sleeps to the music of the falling rill, lulled into slumber by Ungava's song. She, under fate to serve him, as higher spirit lower, caught in the eddy of a mortal passion, spins struggling round, and wildly seeks to know the issue ere it comes. These three are here. No more. Why should a mighty throne in distant universe be moved by what is here, to visit, invisible, this earthly cavern? There lifts the Rod again! The Ring burns hot as fire! What means it? Hist! I hear the stroke of flying feet and rush of garments. It is. It is. Ungava flying comes!”

Thus from the chamber and his presence fled she terror-stricken, filled with shame, that she had been observed by one unseen of her when she revealed her soul to his, seeking to know her destiny. Wild with fear she fled as flees the fawn, when by his yell the springing panther is revealed,—a ball of tawny fury falling through the air, above it feeding. So she with flashing feet fled fast, her garments streaming as streams the plumage of a pheasant sailing on, until she came to that high hall where, in his chair of mystic state, there sat the Wizard of the North, her grandsire, pondering on ancient things and signs that stirred his soul. Into his awful presence wildly did she burst, and with white face and hand high lifted, before him stood and cried : —

“Sire of my sire, Ancient of Days, who hath the early and lost knowledge * of the world and

---

* It is by no means improbable that, as the great prophets, seers, sorcerers, or wizards—call them what you please—of all

all its power on dead and living, tell me, thou who taught me mystery and armed my hand with Rod of power and to my lips gave incantations that out of ashes of old urns and dust of ancient graves can call forth those who once with life did warm the mouldered clay, and from the bosom of the living summon the soul articulate, and to my eyes didst give the sight which sees through space and graves: tell me, if in the universe there moves a body or a soul that, coming out of living-land or dead-land, can stand within arm's reach of me and not be peoples and times have claimed, there was in the beginning of the world a far closer connection between this earth and the invisible worlds than now is provable. In all sacred literatures, whether Christian, Jewish, or Pagan, — so called by us whose pride is equaled only by our ignorance of primal things, — this claim is boldly made, and miracle-working, or the doing of things outside the regular course or order of nature, is made, in them all, the very basis of the structure around which they, as the verbal expression, have grown. It is evident to all scholars that back of what is known as modern civilization were other and more perfect ones, whose very ruins are a marvel to us all. It would seem that as we are only mere copyists in architecture, so we are only borrowers from the past of all that is really valuable in our faiths and moral code. No one with a heart can but lament that there is to-day no connection, whatever, in the form of communication, between those who live on the earth and our loved ones who live beyond it. The great loss that has fallen on man is this entire loss of the old-time connection with the invisible world.

---

seen?" So cried she standing in her fright before him.

Then he in answer : —

"Ungava, daughter, last of my race, born unto dubious doom, to whom I have revealed the mysteries of life and death, and taught those ancient arts which give to lip and hand an awful power, and to thine eyes the sight that looketh, seeing, into graves and far beyond ; what has disturbed thy soul ? What power has baffled ? Tell me plainly all, that I may plainly answer."

Then she in haste, awe-stricken, made reply :—

"The Trapper slept. I am a woman and I love him. The threads of fate spun at my birth are tangled with his own. If he shall love me, happy will my life go on and happy will it end. I then shall be as mortal woman having lived and loved. My children will come after and our race be endless. If not, I do lose all that earth holds for a woman, and I die unmated, and in loneliness I shall live on forever. The rill with soothing murmurs fell. I sang him soothing song. He slept. Above him sifted I the dust which brings oblivion to mortal sense. Then from his breast I summoned forth his soul and questioned it if it might tell me, if my destiny were joy or woe. His soul obeyed me and made answer as I asked. I went. He woke. I came again. He was disturbed in soul. My spell was almost broken by some other spell. Some other power, most potent, had almost, by a dream, betrayed me. I was amazed, but passed it lightly off. In vain, for, in the dust where I had stood, he pointed to my footprints, and did say, 'There didst thou or thy spirit stand as I lay slumbering.' Then to another footprint plainly pressed into the yielding fur of the white skin on which his head was laid, he pointed, and exclaimed, 'Here, with arms outstretched above my head to shield or save, did my own Atla stand.'

"Sire of my sire, great Seer and Prophet, who is this Atla? What spirit is there in the universe more strong than I, when standing, Rod in hand, in incantation? Tell me, by Ring and Rod, if one there is in living-land or dead-land that can stand within arm's reach of me at such a moment, seeing, and remain unseen by me?"

Long sat he without speech. The Rod moved in his hand and from the ring there blazed a flash of conscious flame. His eyes were fixed upon her startled face. Slowly and soundless moved his lips. At last he murmured, as murmuring to his soul: —

“Atla? Atla? Atla-ntis! * Is, then, the old race gone from the earth they loved and ruled, forever? Is that first tree of knowledge stripped to its last sweet leaf? It must be so. How did it read? Alas! How many years and graves have sifted down their smothering dust upon that sentence since 'twas said. Can I recall it? Aye, now it comes. ‘The last and best shall bear the name of Motherland.’ Atla, the last of that great queenly line, is dead, and with her died her race. Ungava lives, and with her lives her race,—perhaps. Now see I all. Now read I well the riddle. ‘Love cuts all knots, and love may out of fate deliver.’ If he may love her?”

Then to Ungava plainly did he say: —

“Ungava, daughter, listen. I now will tell you gravest things. We must take deepest council. In the beginning two races were on earth, the earth-born and the visitant. In union were they joined and from the union two other races sprang. Ours was not greatest. The other greater was. It held the cradle of the world, and hence, prolific, sent its children toward the setting sun and southward. Our race the other was, and we came northward, which then was Summer-Land. Thus separate, divided, each of the two held to its own development in power and rank. Ours was the lesser, always. They built on reason and present things. We on the future world, credulous and superstitious ever. This Atla is the last and greatest of that race and its old queenly line, as thou art last of that religious Caste with us, that holdeth Rod and Ring of power. By some strange chance she must have met this Trapper, and have loved. From distance greater than the farthest star from earth a thousand times, as you did summon forth his soul to claim it, she, hastening hither, flew. I heard her come and go, invisible to eyes to which all graves are only mirrors. This Rod did lift and bow obedient as she passed, and on my trembling hand the conscious Ring flashed startled recognition. She, she it was who stood above the Trapper's head, unseen of you. Greater than we, she is. Her power is stronger. Ungava, Atla is your rival, and she knows all!"

---

* This refers to the belief of many scholars and those who have thoughtfully, with learned minds, examined the subject first broached by Plato, that in the Atlantic Ocean, stretching westward from the coast of Africa, was a great continent-island called Atlantis, from which the Atlantic Ocean derived its name, and that in this island the human race began its career.

Then stood she white in dumb amaze at what her ears had heard. Atla her rival, and Atla had seen all! Who was this Atla? Where was she and where was she not? Perhaps e'en now her mighty orbs were on her! What might she do?

Then to her, standing thus all white with fear, her grandsire came. He took her hand and gravely said:—

"My daughter, child of a race that dieth with thee if thou diest without issue, on yonder couch of skins I pray thee seek some needed rest. Thou art o'ertaxed. This matter leave to me. It needs grave thought and deepest wisdom, lest by blunder we lose all. Sleep thou in peace. I will the Trapper summon here and tell him much of ancient times and things. I will observe his soul, and at the last lead up to thee. Such man as he was never on this earth, if, seeing thee as he shall see, knowing thee as he shall know, his soul shall not in love or pity give itself to thee. So on this couch convenient let now thy frame repose. Close eyes; yield mind and thought to me. While with entreating and persuasive gesture I from thy soul draw trouble and call sweet slumber down. So, gently does she pass from ills that are and thoughts of ills to be into that realm that lies beyond the line of mortal sense and pain. I would that when she wakes she might awake into a world of equal peace."

CHAPTER V.

THE CONJURER'S ACCOUNT OF THE GENESIS* OF THE WORLD.

“HERE have I brought you, Trapper, that, in answer to your questioning, I might narrate the Genesis of the world, and tell you of the races which earliest dwelt on earth; of that first innocence which represented God, and how it fell; of arts and powers once known, now lost to men, and of that primal truth which underlies religions, superstitions, creeds, and is to them what vital element is to human blood. Here sit thee down, and, while Ungava sleeps, I will rehearse the tale of olden times, and you shall know the lore of that old world which is forever gone, and all the glory of that race which once shone on the heads of millions, but which, like candle

---

* Whatever the reader may think of this as an accurate history of the beginning of the world and the “Fall of Man,” it can doubtless be regarded as accurate as, and certainly more philosophic than, the one to which Milton stands sponsor in his “Paradise Lost”; that magnificent fiction of imagination, which has imposed a theology upon the Christian world which, for the most part, is diametrically opposed to good sense and sound Scripture both.

burned to socket, now flickers feebly in two feeble lives. Never before, beyond the limits of our Caste, did this old lore go forth; but you shall know the truth as it has come from mouth to mouth in sacred speech and accurate, from those who saw and knew whereof they told. I tell it you, hoping it may live when she and I are numbered with the stars.

“ This, then, was in the beginning, and this the cause and order of that first development whose ruined glory is to-day a marvel.

“ No art or science, Trapper, worth the name, was ever born on earth. All have come down from races throned amid the spheres, who, through unnumbered ages, had clomb slowly up the slopes of fine intelligence, and terraced Heaven with knowledge. When these on wing inquisitive in downward flight came to the earth, with them they brought all knowledge and all grace, and planted here the germs of needed progress. By these the earth in infancy was taught. Knowledge was borrowed from the skies. The seeds of every precious growth were sown wide cast from hands whose skill eternity had taught. Through these superior ones the earth did gain and lose all worth the having.

From them it gained the skill to build, to fashion, and to mould; and traces of their mighty work are found to-day in ruins wide as acres, in forms that stand gigantic in the forests of the East, in jungles which once were gardens of the gods, in mountains disrupted by volcanic shocks, but which, smooth-sloped and joined by intervals of verdure, once gave summer residence to those who longed to breathe the cooler airs from snowy summits blown, that are a wonder. Men stand and gaze at them astounded, not knowing what hand or skill could shape and hew such mighty sculptures. From them, too, came the knowledge of the skies. They were the Stars of Morning who sang the heavens into place and named to human ears the constellations. They fixed the orbit of the earth; called time from out eternity by measurement of day and night, of months and years; and zoned the earth by temperatures. They did unfold the mystery of the magnetic circle around which sweeps the restless steel, and so gave courage unto men to push their ships beyond the sight of land, sail far and wide through pathless oceans, bravely trusting life and gold to a sliver of thin metal, thus giving birth to commerce which stands parent to the brotherhood of man. From them, too, came the arts of healing; the use of poisons, which, left untouched till time of need, are antidotes to death; the knowledge of all herbs medicinal, which give to every pain and ache its healing leaf; of oils, which, penetrating joint and bone, drive out the lurking pain, or, spread as ointment on the skin, pink it with health and smooth all wrinkles out,—those scars of smiting fortune; of perfumes, how distilled, how mingled, how preserved, that out of many sweets perfected sweets may come, that mortals might be charmed from joys of grosser to those of finer senses. From them, moreover, knowledge came of metals, where found, how worked and manufactured into forms of use and ornament according to the laws of high utility and taste. They taught the laws of architecture unto men; the principle of the arch,—that key of utmost strength; the column, plain or fluted,—that symbol of high stateliness; the crowning capital which flowers the stony stalk with airy beauty; and how tall tower and minaret and steeple and the rounded dome should shape the massive structure underneath into proportions rhythmic. The cereals that give food to man were from the wild abundance of material chosen and by careful culture propagated unto perfection. Last of all, they taught them written language, symbolic and phonetic both. First in pictures,* that their childish eyes might be enticed to learn and easily catch sense from shade of color and from shape. Then in arbitrary forms which were for scholars, ranges of high thought and universal traffic in ideas answering universal needs; that all the race, in all its tribes and families, in every zone remote and clime distinct, might by one universal avenue come at last, as after triumph, marching into apprehended brotherhood. In all these ages of celestial teaching, Trapper, the future was not hidden from the present nor dead from living. They did come at call and ghostly terrors were not known. The earth-born died; but not as those whose lives have ended, but have just begun. The heavenly ones died not until within immortal veins death entered, as I will tell, by wrong, unfit admixtures of the lower with higher blood. Of this I will now speak.

---

* Probably the oldest language or method of communicating thought was that of signs, or pantomimic, next to which, beyond doubt, stands the "Picture Language," which we find carried to perfection in the hieroglyphics of Egypt.

“Trapper, religions change. They flood and ebb like tides. The old die out and new ones come. They are deciduous. A thousand years, — which in the cycle of existent things are only as are years to centuries,— their leaves, nutritious, medical, fall for the healing of the nations, then they leafless, sapless stand, and are from habit worshiped for other thousand years, though out of them all power for good is gone, and the once vital growth for human need stands, cold and bare, a rigid system of devout formality. The Deity changes also with the changes of the human mind, growing and shrinking as it grows and shrinks in knowledge. Men of different climes and ages give Him different names and nature. Now He is this, now that. According as they know or dream or feel, so is He. Man makes his Deity, and worships the pictured idol of his mind whether false or true, and, worshiping, grows into likeness of his idol whether good or bad.

“But, Trapper, listen, and remember what I say; for it is true. Back of all these changes and these picturings of men, good, bad, or both, or neither, there stands forever the Eternal Power who made and makes all things by spoken word immediate or slow evolving law, as seemeth to Him good and answereth His own purpose best. The I Am of the Jew, the Zeus of Greece, the Jove of Rome, the Sacred Fire of Persia, the Odin of the North, the Manitou of Red Man, the God of Christian, is evermore the same; the One Great Deity, the Cause, Creator, Ruler, Preserver of universal man, animals, and things. We know He is our Father. That is all we know. The propagating principle strikes its deep root into His own white vitalness, and from it draws unintermittent sap and is forever active. Beyond this simple fact, self-evident, we nothing know. All else is born of fancy, wish, or ignorance, or that infernal pride and cruelty of scheming, grasping priestcraft, which manufactures attributes of terror, digging hells and walling heavens in, that it may hold the keys of them and dominate, through fear, the lives of women and the souls of men.

“This world was made by Him, not as a special act, to loom forever, vast and high, in the blue sky of universal sight; nor as a theater on whose eye-compelling stage great tragedy is played that He might make exhibit of His Love and Power: for He is always making worlds innumerable and filling them with races, as He, in summer, fills meadow land with flowers. For when He made, He made it as a residence and home for earth-born and for spirits both, who, for ages numberless, uncalendared, had grown in grace and knowledge of finest arts and holy things; and these to earth came down to give the new earth knowledge and to teach the lowly ones of clay the science of pure life and lay in law and helpful order broad and deep the strong foundations of development, that they in time might grow to their estate and so have freedom of the Universe. Thus was it, Trapper, and no other way, as I and other like me have had from record, memory-kept, handed down to us from that first day when they, the Stars of Morning, sang welcome to the new-made world and songs of praise to Him, the Maker.

“So was it at the first. The earth was free to all, and heavenly ones came down as knowledge comes to ignorance, to teach it and assist. These were the White Ones of the world, the mighty Sons of God, and were, by right of knowledge and of power, the rulers of the earth. They taught it science, gave it laws, transmitted hither arts of building and of healing, tested the qualities of earthly things,— its minerals, ores, and precious gems,—divided base from pure, measured the orbit of the earth, its axis calculated and fixed its place among the constellations which rule its motion, and gave them names familiar to the ears of lower earth-born men.* These mighty ones, these teachers from the skies, these wise and holy beings, were the gods of earth, and so they stand to-day in all the ancient literatures,—grotesque, weird, meaningless, because their cause, their order, and their old significance are lost and scattered, crudely woven into later superstitions,—mere shreds and patches of a glorious fabric that once was perfect whole.†

---

* It is plain that in early ages mankind were divided into Totemic sects or families bearing animal names. From this arose the fables of animals having human speech. When we read in some old author that the Fox talked with the Crow or the Wolf to the Sheep, it simply means that a man of the Fox Totem or Tribe talked with a man of the Crow Tribe, or one of the Wolf family with one who bore the Sheep as his Totem or family name. It would be natural, as astronomical knowledge grew and stellar discoveries were made, that the forming constellations should receive these Totemic names, in compliment, perhaps, to the Tribes or Nations that bore them. It is as if astronomy were now forming the constellations and grouping the starry systems and should call one the Constellation of England, and another of Russia, instead of Saturn or Orion.

† The Mythologies of Greece and Rome are unquestionably based on great facts of personal existences and actual history

“ Now hearken. When first the Sons of God, the gifted ones of Heaven, came visitant to earth,—which was not till the slow evolving movement of creation had, through ages long, circled its full sphere, and earth and all its creatures perfect stood,—they found on earth a race of beings strangely born. They had come upward by evolving* growth and were of many orders. Each bore in mind or mood, in body sturdy or light, a dim resemblance to his or her original. In each, by motion, look, by style of voice or eye, by color, management of form or characteristic passion, was hint of prototypes in distance hidden.

“ Some were as tigers, fiercely strong and beautiful with wild and savage beauty, softening into purring moods at times, and sweet maternal that belong to remotely early ages. Neptune, Jove, Hercules, Mars, Vulcan, these were all once men, kings, rulers, noted benefactors of the human race, and not mere creations of the fancy of Grecian and Roman poets. They are the shades or ghosts of once living, substantial persons, whose natural forms are lost to the historic eye in the dim distances of unrecorded times and so are therefore seen in grotesque misshapeness.

---

* This old Nasquapee Conjuror or Prophet had evidently a pretty correct conception of Darwin's system or idea of evolution. It might be interesting to inquire whence he derived his knowledge so closely in accordance with advanced modern thought on the development of the human species.

tendernesses. Some were lithe and subtle as the snake when, sinuous and glossy with new skin, he charms the innocent bird to his keen fangs. Some had the haughty loneliness of the snow-headed eagle, and his eye to gaze undazzled at the sun, when, soaring high o'er cloud and shade through crystal air with steady wing in level flight, he grazes its hot rim and glances, with shrill scream of challenge, onward; — that scream which hunters trailing on in silence hear come hissing, tearing downward like a burning arrow, and wonder what the awful sound may be and whence it came. Swift and strong to swoop and strike were they, and death flew with their shadow. Nor lacked these earth-born races skill to make and build, for they were cunning with the cunning of the bee and ant and those winged architects which weave their homes from textile hair, from gossamer floss or floating fibers, and hang them pendent by shrewd fastening from the swaying bough. But they were fickle, fierce or ignorantly weak, and had no common language and lacked the mind to organize and push on and up to final finish what they set hand to. So nothing of their doing was carried to perfection, or broadly based to stand the wear of time and shocks of change. Hence all they did fell down in ruin ere 'twas done, and all their progress was in circles moving round and round in endless imperfection.

“ But of their women, there were some whose loveliness was hued and odored like the earth, their mother, when amorous warmth sweetens her swelling breasts with bloom and spice; and pungent odors fill the nose with pleasure and with longing for more and deeper inhalations. Dark were these women, but glorious as the night when through its spaces of warm dusk the stars are powdered thick and all its swarth is flushed with latent light and heat. Some were superbly calm,—their movements as the swan's, slow, stately, proud, reposeful as still pools vine-bordered, starred with lilies,—on whose bosoms, warm and sweet, a man might sleep forever nor wish to wake. Blooded were some like fire, veined with passions swarth, as hot as torrid heat in jungles, electric as the night when all the gloom sweats odors which o'ercome the senses, and in it, latent, lurks the unkindled lightning. In some were strange magnetic powers, known or unknown to them, and he on whom, when place and time and mood were apt, they slowly fixed their orbéd eyes, half-closed, voluptuous, lost higher wit and virtue and every sense save sweet receptiveness, and yielding, overcome, did gently sink into their gracefully lifted arms as into sweetest heaven. Some won by gentleness and goodness, being of mild natures, dispositions sweet, modest, and shy as antelopes or the gazelle, and lovely as untutored grace might be and that sweet modesty which, startled at first thoughts of love, shrinks timid from the sight of its own loveliness. These women of the Earth, novel to Heaven's sight, lifted eyes of homage to the Sons of God, wise, strong, and holding kingly rank, and in the splendor of their beauty lay at their feet in humble worship, graceful, solicitous, enticing. Nor did they fail in their wild, natural wooing. For they were honest in it, being all enthralled with glorious face and form and spectacle of rank, and, more than all, their loveliness was great. So were the White Ones of the world, pure-blooded, deathless Sons of God, drawn downward to the lower type in amorous admiration, and took of them wives as many as they chose.*

---

* Genesis vi. 2.—The Sons of God saw the daughters of men, earth-born, that they were fair. And they took them wives of all which they chose.

“So ruin came to the first world and order. The pure crossed with the impure lost their purity for aye. The mountain streams, flowing crystal from the fount of God, fell into valley pools and were forever roiled. The temper of the skies, serene and sweet, was roughened and made sour. The bright intelligence of Heaven, quick to invent, to see, to analyze, fashion and construct, was clouded; the even disposition thrown from its poise, the just judgment warped, the holy, vital force to will and do, running clear from the Font of Life, grew thick with earthly mixtures. All certainty of holy birth was lost. The propagating instinct, drawn from God, was turned against Him, for mongrelism,* — that worst and deadliest sin, corrupting all,— was lifted on to thrones that ruled the world, and, with power perverted ever after, helped to mar it.

---

* The practice of “out crossing” as it is called by breeders was, evidently, not favored by the Divine Parent of the human race as he everywhere set law and custom against it. There is not a race that has ever gained, symmetrically, by marrying beyond its own blood. The pure-blooded, inbred races are those who reached and maintained a high level of excellence. The Jews, Egyptians, Greeks, Romans, Irish, might all be quoted in support of this position. The idea that a great, symmetrically formed race can ever be built up in this Continent on the basis of nationalized mongrelism is scouted by all history. God and history are alike against it.

“ So fell the race of God. So virtue went forever from the earth, and sin came in. The leaders of the blind were blinded, and both fell down together into deepest ditch. As entered mortal mixtures into deathless veins, death entered, not as new birth from lower unto higher at full-time pregnancy, but as doom, and with each added birth there came new risk and ruin to mankind. Like poisonous vapor out of noxious pools, rising cold and dank, death slowly up the shining slopes of tainted generations rose, until in darkness it enveloped all from basest hut to noblest throne. And thus with sin against pure blood came death into the world.

“ Thus the first glory of the world went down in ruin. The tree of knowledge, whose fruit your Scriptures say the woman ate,—a fable growing out of fact, a withered leaf of old-time knowledge, fragrant still, garnered by poet out of Jewish lore, garnered by Jew in turn from literatures that had it full in prose and verse a thousand and ten thousand years before the day that Abraham or even Job drew breath,—was marriage with the gods, from which—as was in nature sure to be—came power to hand and knowledge into heart and head, which they, earth-born, untaught, undisciplined, weak or wicked, knew not how to use aright, or, knowing, because of evil in them, perverted it to evil use. The sin was not on woman, but on him, who, for his wanton pleasure, lifted her to marriage bed beyond her dignity, and to familiar sight of powers and forces, agencies and agents, that were beyond her ken or skill to understand or use aright. She was forbid to taste the fruit of that forbidden tree as childish ignorance, inquisitive, is commanded not to touch the fire that burns. But more was he a hundred times forbid who lifted her unto its branches sweet with flower and odorous leaf, and put the luscious fruit into her longing mouth. The woman erred unconscious, according to the longing of her ambitious, ardent nature. But the man she tempted, or was tempted by, who did lift her up, from love or lust, unto the level of forbidden bed and all the life and knowledge which, through wifehood, motherhood, and daily intercourse it gave, did sin against the dignity of his high nature and a law which in his clear intelligence blazed warningly as blazes beacon fixed above the rocks of wreck and death."

CHAPTER VI.

THE WHITE GOD OF MISTASSINNI.

“THUS in the beginning gained the earth whatever it has had of glory. It gained. It lost. For of the mingling of the higher with the lower, there came, not all at once but gradually, a lapse and weakening of that vital force which had come down from heaven; a clouding of that bright intelligence which only cycles of eternity can give the seeking mind; a lowering of the tone and level of ambition, which erst sought only noble ends; and, worst of all, a lapse in holiness. The pure imagination was befouled, a grossness came to appetite, the moral sense was blunted — that sentinel of God, which, while it stood instinct with heavenly life, kept perfect guard above sweet innocence and trustful virtue.

“So passed the ages, and the earth grew upward in external glory but downward into moral ruin. Then shocks were felt which shook the solid world. Catastrophes were multiplied. Here Fire, there Water, and at some other point

Frost, wrought its work of ruin. Chaos had come again. The Mother-land sank under sea, and with it went the treasures and the records of the primeval cycle. Here and there a colony survived and carried down to later ages some feeble fragments of the glorious whole that had been shattered into ruins. Only these survived. The sphered excellence of high achievement, perfect in holiness, glorious as a globe illuminated, proof of what moral rectitude with mortal power might do, was lost forever.

“Then out of space there came a vagrant world flying in unguided, lawless flight; a world on fire,—a funeral pyre of some old race, perhaps—and as it passed, monstrous in size, flying faster by ten thousand times than this small globe wheels on, nigh to that point which now is northern pole, the home of Arctic cold, which then was Summer-land,* where dwelt, ’mid flowers that faded not and fruits that ripened for each day of the round year, my race; it struck the earth, and in the twinkling of an eye

---

* There is no possible way to explain the presence of many forms of tropic life found, by whalers and Arctic explorers, within the Arctic circle, save on the supposition that a sudden and life-destroying change of climate came, in some prehistoric period, to the polar region.

my race became extinct. The level axis of the earth was, by the dreadful shock, knocked obliquely up, the round of Nature's order changed, summer and winter rushed into alternate place, and transposed were the zones. Thus, Trapper, died the first two races of the earth. The one sank under water, and the legend of that flood is told in almost every language of the world.* The other perished under shock from heaven which crushed them on the instant. As falls the hammer on the anvil so death fell on them. They knew not it was coming till it came. Beneath that blow they and their mighty works were beaten into dust. The gravel of these northern wilds that mark the landscape is granulation of ancient palaces. We are within the circle of a ruin that buried half the world as you bury bodies under sand.†

---

* It is a remarkable fact that in Egyptian literature, historic or legendary, there is not the least hint of or allusion to the Flood. In Plato's "Atlantis" the aged Priest of the Temple at Sais who entertained Solon, Plato's grandfather, while living in exile out of Greece, accounts for this fully. He explained to Solon — I quote from memory — that the reason why Egypt had no special memory of the Flood was because there had been many such local catastrophes on the earth since the beginning, of which their records had knowledge, and that there was no legend about that special one because the facts of it were all fully known to them.

† This certainly explains that mystery of the earth — the great geological puzzle — the Drift. Whence came it, when, and how?

“ Here at Ungava, where fruits and flowers were then, there was a colony of that old race which lived in Summer-land of the North. This fringe of population, not wholly pure in blood but mixed with other races which they met as they pushed southward, escaped, and so remained a feeble remnant of that primal stock that once held all the North. Trapper, this is enough. You know the past. I am of it and of that Caste which 'mid the ancient folk held Sacred Keys of knowledge and of power preserved from earliest days,—a knowledge that knows all that has been, and a power that bridges death and brings across it at my call the feet of those who over it, amid the wailing of their friends, did pass to distant realms. One thing alone remains for me to tell. It is a modern happening, and gets significance from what it means to you and her. Listen now, and hear.

“ When he who was the sire of the old, tongueless chief of Mistassinni was but a boy, he found, one morn at sunrise, on the beach of that great inland sea far westward of the lake where lived his tribe, a boy of his own age. He lay upon the sand as dead. His face was white as snow. His hair was gold. Upon his bosom there was traced strange Totem, unknown to all the tribes. It was a double letter thus:—H-H—in color red as blood. He had come over sea in boat not built by hands; at least, so seemed it to the tribes that knew no boat save such as their own hands had fashioned. That boy revived. The young chief fed and brought him by his hand unto the council chamber of his tribe, and all the ancients hailed him as fulfillment of a prophecy old as itself, that, ‘After many years, out of the West, in boat not made with hands, should come a god white-skinned with yellow hair.’ Thus came unto the tribe of Mistassinni that ‘White God,’ as he is known through all the North. He grew in stature and in grace; was fair to look upon, and wise. He learned their tongue; his own was all unknown to them. He married princess of our Caste. A son was born. That son am I. To him was born a son of other princess, for our Caste weds within its circle and goes not beyond. That son had child. Enough of this; we will go back. For of this ‘White God’ would I tell, that you may know him. Then would I a solemn question ask.

“In battle he was chief. He was not large in stature, but as the fight roared on and hotter grew he grew in size until at the white heat of it he filled the field. His presence was an atmosphere, which, being breathed, made those who breathed it braver, so that each lifted arm in the long ranks that saw him fight struck downward as if muscled to his shoulder. He flamed the fight as lightning, in mid-ocean, on some tempestuous night, flames the black billows. No fear was in him. Battle to his soul was as wedding hour to ardent lover. Through whirling hatchets, circling axes, brandished spears, and arrows driving through the air like hail in winter, he would swoop as through the flying leaves, gust-whirled in autumn, eye fixed and talons set, the forest hawk swoops to his quarry. No man e'er lived on whom he set his blazing eye in battle. In peace his face was sunny. Through his yellow beard his skin showed as a girl's. His eye was as a pool, on whose still surface lilies sleep unstirred by breath of wind. But when it came to blows his face grew gray as steel, his eyes blazed bluish black as winter's sky, when all the warmth is frozen out of wave and star, and heaven itself is pitilessly cold. But when the fight was over he would take his wounded foes and bear them to his tent and nurse them as a mother her sick child. Many he healed and with strong bodies they went home, to be his foes again, and fight him on some other day.

“Once only was he merciless. It was that year that they of Mistassinni hunted seal on the west coast of wild Ungava, where the ebb and flood of icy tides are twenty times the height of man’s full stature. One day a ship drove in whirled onward by a tempest from the north, through froth and foam that whitened her black hull a spear’s length deep from stern to stem. Onward she drove before the whistling winds, her sails in tatters streaming in thin strips from spar and mast, until the mighty eddy, spinning round ’twixt a great island and main shore, dashed her, side on and downward, with a crash, as she were eider’s egg, upon the beach in front of our encampment. One only of her crew survived the shock, and he, a giant, battle-axe in hand, stood on the sand unharmed. We gathered round him as he stood at guard, our seal spears pointed into sand that he might know we fought no man that had been flung by God’s swift-handed mercy out of death.*

---

*The superstition of an Indian forbids him to kill one who, apparently, had had a miraculous escape from death. Many

“Then came our Leader slowly down the slope to where we stood, our peaceful spears in sand, a smile of welcome on his face and light of gladness shining in his eye. So came he and within the circle of our mercy stood. But as his eye fell, at short distance, on the man, his face turned into ice. Its skin grew gray as steel. His eyes two orbs of fire became. From nighest girdle plucked he battle-axe and on the stranger stalked until he came within arm’s reach. Then tore furred vestment from his breast until the dreadful Letter painted on his snow-white skin showed red as blood. So stood he posed. In one clinched hand was fragment of torn skins, torn from his heart; the other gripped the battle-axe. Thus in the hollow circle of our mercy stood the two, our God and giant stranger. Then out of sockets bulged the giant’s eyes. The coarse skin of his cheeks did pallid grow. His black hair, rising slowly, lifted woolen cap from head. His big knees, bigger than joints of moose, shook under his huge bulk. A fit of white men have escaped their vengeance because of this feeling. Captain Rogers, the noted scout, who fell or slid safely down the front of the great cliff on Lake George, which was, because of his perilous feat, named after him, is one of the instances out of many which might be mentioned in this connection.

---

trembling seized him. Down fell he on his knees while in his monstrous jaws rattled his teeth, fear-shook. Then out of quavering mouth there came a scream, 'Captain, have mercy!' Speechless still, our Leader, without word or sign, upward swung his axe and on the suppliant's head he brought it down so heavily that through the cloven crown its broad base sank to mangled jowl, and the big bone handle flew in fragments to the striker's hand. Then, turning face upon us white as God's own wrath, he said, 'Throw this damned carcass into torrent swift and eddy deep, that they may whirl and float it where my father's soul beyond the northern straits waits to snatch it toward the mouth of hell and thrust his murderer in.' Trapper, thou art white man without cross, and of his race and speech. In battle thou art bigger, but no braver. Who was this White God of rocky Mistassinni? Who was his father? What the red Totem on his heart — the double Letter red as blood? My power is blinded to this mortal thing. Beyond, I might see better. Canst thou tell?"

"Ay, ay," replied the Trapper. "Prophet, well I know the race of this White God of Mistassinni, who was his sire, and what the double

Letter on his breast did mean. The boy who came, wind-blown from out the sea, leagues west of Mistassinni, in boat not built by mortal hand, — because not built of bark, — and lay at sunrise on the beach all wet and foul with brine and sand, and by the old Chief's grandsire there was found, adopted, worshiped as a god by all the tribes, was son of bravest man that ever trod a deck or chanced the dice with death that he might westward find a pathway for the commerce of the world and bring to knowledge of the Cross of God the distant tribes of men. His name, old Seer, was Henry Hudson,* and the monogram or Totem — call it as you please, as you be red or white — upon his breast, was the two first letters of his name cunningly blent in one. This boy the old Chief's grandsire found upon the beach was that sweet son of his, scarce more than child, who bravely by his father's side stood up, when by his crew, in cruel mutiny, the boat was pushed from his stout ship, that it might

---

* I can but refer the reader to the history of early navigators, of whom Henry Hudson was one of the bravest, for a full account of his sad fate and that of his brave boy, when his mutinous crew forced him into an open boat and sent it adrift in the wild waters which now bear his name. Neither he nor his son was ever seen by white men after.

bear them, drifting, unto awful death. Ay, now I know why he was merciless when on Ungava's beach his father's murderer knelt roaring for mercy. God! what a blow in judgment did he strike, and how it eased his soul. Prophet, thou art above the common superstitions of the tribes, and I have told you truth. This fabled God of Mistassinni; this White One of the North the tribes do worship, was Henry Hudson's son, a man of my own race and tongue, whose death has been a mystery for twice a hundred years. Go on and tell me all. This is great news. The world of letters and of men beyond these wastes of rock and leagues of rootless snow and ice will thrill with wonder when it learns from thee, through me, the fate of Hudson and his boy. Whom wedded he? Were children born to him? Are any of his name and blood alive, or is the line extinct? Prophet, I swear that I would trail a trail until my head was white if at the end of it my eyes might look upon the face of one within whose veins there flowed the noble blood of Hudson."

Long sat the Prophet silently revolving in his mind what he had heard. His features lighted as a shuttered window, pane by pane, grows out of darkness, with the coming of the dawn. His eyes of night glowed under brows of snow as to the Trapper's face he lifted them. Then slowly out of parting lips there came the words:—

“In cheek of snow that thou hast seen, O Trapper, runs this mighty blood. Thy head need never whiten on the trail that leads thee to thy wish. The face that thou wouldst see, lies there on yonder couch of skins. Ungava is the child of the White God. She ends the line.”

Then up the Trapper rose. His face white as Ungava's, as she lay unconscious on the couch of skins whose fur was black as jet digged in the caves of night. A moment stood he dumb. Then said he, standing straight:—

“Prophet, thou art a man of many days. Truth should be on thy lips and fear of God. But thou dost tell a tale so strange that to thy face I say I cannot credit it. Proof there must be of this; proof sure as eye may see. Give me some proof that she, the saviour of my life, is of the White God's blood, or I will go my way as one who hears an idle story told.”

Then slowly from the chair of polished horns the Seer of many days with stately motion rose. His pale face paler grew, and his thin hand, on which the stone of mystic power blazed red, trembled and shook:

“Never before,” he cried, “since from my sire, as God did take him,* received I ring of power and wand that burns because I will it, has mortal doubted word of mine, and lived. Thou art my guest and ignorant, thou mighty man, therefore I do forgive. Linked, also, is her soul with thine, and how or what the issue is to be, for good or ill, I know not. Hence let it pass. Dost thou ask proof; proof such as eye can see? Come hither then. Fear not; the trance in which she slumbers sweetly holds all senses locked. Behold, from breast of snow beneath which dwells her spirit pure as that white star that never moves from where it sentinels the center of all worlds and systems which move obedient round it, I lift this virgin vestment. Tell me, thou doubting man, dost thou see sign that cannot lie? Is not Ungava child of the White God?” And lo! with starting eyes the Trapper saw, in color red as blood, the double Letter on her bosom white as drifting snow!

---

*“And Enoch was not, because God took him.”

“ Enough, enough,” he cried in solemn tones.
“ It is enough. That is a sign that cannot lie.
Ungava is the child of your White God! By all I hope and long for in the world to come, I would we two had never met ! ”

CHAPTER VII.

THE COUNCIL OF THE CHIEFS.

THEN came a runner, running from the south. O'er fields of sand ploughed by the winds in ridges; over stretches of blocked ice, cracked into squares, blue, green, and white,—a strange mosaic of gigantic size,—he sped as if some dreadful death was speeding on his trail. From village unto village did he run, and as he ran he cried: —

“To arms! to arms! the Esquimaux are coming! A thousand warriors armed for fight, and at their head an ancient chief stalks on.”

So ran he and so cried his wild alarm. Then roared the villages as roars the hollow log when some rude shock has startled hive within. The cry of woman and of child arose. It swelled in vengeful shrillness, strident, fierce as eagle's scream. Out of each warrior's mouth there burst the battle yell, and hatchets edged for death flashed in the air.

Then flocked the chiefs to council, and the Indian Parliament was held,—that place of high debate where nature's eloquence is heard and noble speech leads up to nobler deeds. No idle word is spoken there. No wily politician counsels for self-gain. Each word is from the heart. Each sentence like sure stroke of axe; and they who speak, speak for the good of all, and every statement or appeal is backed with readiness to die.

In the high hall of that old cavern they did meet. The man of ancient days sat in his awful chair, carved into shapes fantastic, weird, hewn from wood unknown among the timber of the world to-day, bristling with polished horns whose every point shone like a star, and standing on the pavement black as night, whose gloom was lighted with the signs of Zodiac in brightest gold. On this strange seat, mysterious, the Wizard sat, Head of the Council. Upon his banded brows were horns of burnished gold. Midway between their roots, large as a star, a diamond blazed. The mystic Rod was in his stronger hand. Upon the other gleamed the dreadful Ring, instinct with conscious fire. Pale was his face. His hair, snow-white as whitened wools, lay on his shoulders thin. Beneath his brows projecting, glowed his eyes, bright with concentrate light.

Thus was he seated. On his right the Trapper sat, strong-featured, grave of face, observant. On his left, the Chief of Mistassinni, withered, bloodless, thin, as body that had risen out of old embalmment. Then inward filed, with slow and stately pace, the chieftains of the Nasquapees. Each in the solemn circle took his place. Each on the earth fixed eye and silent sat. No glance of fire, no moving lip was there. They sat as sit the dead in circle placed. The silence of the chamber might be felt. Thus sat they taciturn and grim, while hour-glass would have run its sands half out.

Then slowly rose an aged chief. His head was gray with years, but straight he was as is the pine's trunk when crest is shorn. Up rose he straight and stood. Searched with his eye each tawny face with glance of fire; cast blanket down until the Totem showed above his heart; and on his breast an ochred death's-head grinned; then said:—

“Men of Ungava, Nasquapees, straight-standing men,* the hated Esquimaux are coming! I

---

* If you ask a Montagnais Indian what Nasquapee means, he will tell you an atheist, or one who has no God, because the smell them in the air.* They stink like rotting seal. Their bodies lie unburied like fish upon the banks of Peribonka, after freshet. They come to die. The blood of other days is in our veins. We of the Ancient Folk know how to fight. My knife is thirsty. It knows where to drink. Look at my axe. See, it is dull with rust. I'll brighten it to-morrow on their skulls. Whose are these arrows? Look! Are they not clean as are the arrows of a boy? It is so long since their steel heads were driven into flesh. I am a boy myself! When have I seen a foe? It is not gray of years upon my head. Some other boy in playfulness has sprinkled ashes there! We Nasquapees have been asleep. Awake. Remember. Look at my breast. That hole will hold a fist. An Esquimau stabbed me there. It was that day we fought them on the Mar-

---

Nasquapees have no medicine-man. But if you ask a Nasquapee what his tribal name means, he will tell you "a man who stands straight." He will tell you, moreover, that he believes in two Great Spirits, a God and Evil One, and that the reason his tribe never had a medicine-man is because they have a great Prophet who is of the old race whence they all sprang, and that he knows all things and can call the dead back to life when he wishes.

* As I have said in a previous note, the Nasquapees are noted for the delicateness of their scenting faculty, being as a dog is in this respect. Their sense of smell is simply marvelous.

guerite. See where his seal spear pierced. It drove clean through. Look at my back. Beneath the shoulder blade the head came out. To-morrow in the ranks of death I'll find the dog that drove it in, and pay him the old debt."

And, gathering up his blanket over bosom scarred with dreadful wound, he sat him down, while round the lowering circle vengeful murmurs ran.

Then up stood other one. The horns of power were on his head. Around his neck a string of polar claws gleamed white. One eye was gone. The other blazed like coal of fire blown hot. The glowing orb he fixed in turn on each swarth face in silence. Then stretched to fullest length his sinewy arm, and spake:—

"Warriors of the North! Sons of sires that lived in the beginning, what foe has ever seen your backs in battle? Your blood a hundred times has reddened ice on cold Ungava, and fell in battle rain on its coarse gravel. We are a thousand knives. One for each knife comes on. Upon that field above the sounding sea where for a thousand years our sires did fight, there will we fight to-morrow. Look at my face. Where is my other eye? Whose spear's point bored it out? Look at my breast. You cannot see it. It is hidden under scars. Who made them? White Wolf, where is your oldest son? His bones are bleaching on the sands of Mamelons. I saw him fall beneath the axe of Esquimau. His spirit wanders unavenged. Black Bear, where are your children? The Esquimau dogs on the flat banks of Peribonka ate them. Gray Fox, where is your youngest daughter? She toils a slave, beaten by Esquimau whips, at Labrador. Is the old blood frozen in us? No. It burns like fire in autumn rushes. The dead are looking at us. They are bursting out of graves to see if we be men. Listen. Hear. Their voices call for vengeance. One day, give us one day of glorious battle, and we will feed the hungry wolves of wild Ungava fat with flesh of Esquimaux."

So thundered he, and at the closing word of the maimed warrior, up with a yell the circle leapt, and twenty axes lifted high flashed gleaming brightly through the cavern's gloom.

Then on the left of the great chair the Chief of Mistassinni rose, tongueless, withered, thin with age, but his old frame, charged with electric hate, quivered with life intense, while in his head his eyes glowed like a panther's, crouching for his spring. Then every horny point bristling round the Wizard's seat burned brighter, kindling with fiercer fires; and, as the cavern filled with whitest light, around the swarthy circle ran an awful murmur: —

“The dead have risen! Old Mistassinni from his grave above the Saguenay, coming out of dead-land, stands in our council!”

Then murmur died in silence, while in the white light stood the old-time Chief, and signed:—

“Men who stand straight. Sons of the ancient race who once ruled half the world, I, tongueless, speak to you in that old style which has come down to you from the beginning. I am a chief of other days. Your fathers knew me. I was their friend, and in their aid have fought upon the sands of wild Ungava, while you were yet unborn. You know my fame, for it filled all the North. Above the Saguenay I stood the test.* I was at torture stake. An Esquimau tore my tongue from out my mouth, and ate it. Then lighted he the fagots. I did not die. Behold, he who sits there — a man without a cross, white as your God, but red as bravest chief at heart — did rescue me. I lived, and ever since have waited for my day and chance. To-morrow I will fight with you. Your Prophet, he who seeth all in living-land or dead-land, has said that with the Esquimaux my foe is coming. It is well. In battle shall I die, and leaving dead upon the sands my hated foe, I, joyful, will take trail which leads me to my sires. Sons of those with whom in other days I fought; men who stand straight; children of that old race that once ruled half the world; I, of Mistassinni, will fight the Esquimaux with you to-morrow. I have said."

---

* An expression used by an Indian to state that he has stood the torture of the torture stake.

So spake the tongueless chief in stately language of old days, the vivid speech of pantomime, — that quick and universal tongue of ancient races; and, as he sat, the warrior circle rose and facing toward the aged man who had been friend and ally of their sires ere they were born, each warrior, hand on breast, bowed low in stately courtesy to the ground.

Then, after pause, the Trapper rose; and every eye in the dark circle fixed itself in admiration on his mighty frame.

"Men of the North," he said, "your fame is known to me. My name, perhaps, is known to you. I am the friend of yonder aged chief, and was the friend of him whose bosom bore the Tortoise sign, who stemmed the bloody tide with you at Mamelons in that dread fight which God by darkness stopped.* I am The Trapper!"

Then out of every mouth there burst a cry of wonder and applause. Each swarthy hand dashed upward, palm outward, unto him, and every feathered head bowed to the cavern's floor. Then spake he farther: —

"I have come northward with the Chief to see him fight last fight, and prove my love for him by doing as he bids. No greater proof has love than that to give. To-morrow he will find among the Esquimaux his foe. You are the sons of sires who never, beaten, left a bloody field, and need no help from me. I will stand by and see the old Chief has fair fight. So has he bidden and so will I do. I am his friend, and with him keep I word and bond. I have said." And, as he closed, a murmur of assent ran round the circle dark.

---

* Referring to the dreadful fight at the mouth of the Saguenay which the earthquake finally stopped. (See the Doom of Mamelons.)

Then from his chair the Wizard spake, and as he spake the lights burned fading down, and at the closing word the chamber filled with gloom: —

“My children, I, your Prophet, High Priest of that old race which once ruled half the world, of which you are, Ancient of Days, speak words of Fate. To-morrow you shall fight and win. The Chief of Mistassinni shall find foe and chance. In dying he shall put the Trapper under word and bond, and you shall see such fight as never yet was seen on wild Ungava, where fights have been for twice a thousand years. Northward the Esquimaux shall never march again. My hour has almost come. Soon shall I rise, as all my line have risen after many years, into the skies, not knowing death. None of our Caste has ever entered grave. God takes us.* Ungava will go westward to that lake to which of old the White God came. You will not see her ever more. The race that was with ours in the beginning has died, and ours is dying. Fate has it so, and who may alter fate! But make the sunset of my going glorious. To-morrow fight as you nor any ever fought before, that I may feel the pride of ancient days and bear with me a glorious message to your sires as I join them in the skies beyond the northern fires. I, Seer and Prophet, Ancient of Days, have spoken. Go."

---

*Genesis v. 24.— And Enoch was not, because God took him.

And, as he ceased, the lights died out, and through the gloom was heard the sound of softly going feet.

Next day beheld the lines of battle set. A thousand on each side, they stretched across the plain on which a hundred fights had been in other days. On graves where slept their sires, the living stood, ready to die. Then joined the battle. The hostile lines in charging columns met, and out of war's red mouth an awful bellowing poured. Amid the Nasquapees, upon their right, the tongueless Chief of Mistassinni fought. Gray, withered, dumb, he seemed a warrior out of dead-land. He spake no word; from mouth no yell of triumph came, nor order; but silently he killed. The Esquimaux before the dreadful apparition fled. They cried: "The dead have risen! who can the dead withstand!" and ran.

Upon their right, heading the Esquimaux,

another ancient warrior, gray, withered, dumb, fought in same dreadful style. The Nasquapees, affrighted at the awful sight, fled, crying: "The dead have risen! This is no living warrior; — who can the dead withstand!" Thus either end of battle line bent backward and gave way before the ghostly sight.

Then to the Chief of Mistassinni a wounded warrior ran, and cried: "On the far left a warrior risen out of grave is driving all before him. Come and help." And to the Esquimau there came a runner, running as for life, and said: "Come to the other end of battle, for out of death has come a chief of ancient days who driveth all before him." And thus the two old chiefs, who long had waited for this day of vengeance, came hurrying toward each other, and, midway between the scattered wings, met face to face, at last!

So did the two old apparitions stand midway betwixt the lines, grim, silent, glaring at each other, gathering strength for battle unto death. And all the war grew silent as the two, and stood at rest, waiting to see the awful fight begin.

CHAPTER VIII.

DUEL OF THE OLD DUMB CHIEFS.

THEN each his hatchet threw, and all the might of their old withered arms went with the deadly cast. The bright blades whirling on met in mid flight, and steel and handles shivered at the shock like glass. Then up from either line of faces battle-painted, ochred in panoply of death, rose a shrill yell as the war hatchets shivered,—a sight no warrior standing there had ever seen before, though some were gray in war and scarred with half a hundred battles. But on the heel of that wild yell of thoughtless rage and pride, the prophets of each tribe sent forth a wail, low, wild, and long as is the cry of crouching, shivering hound above the dying hunter,—dying in the snow. For well they read the sign, and knew that never yet had warriors lived whose axes met midway between their heads and shivered in the air.

Then the two aged, tongueless foes drew bow and loosened quiver, and quick as lightning's flash set shaft to tightened string. The air between them on the instant thickened with flying shafts; the rounded shields of walrus hide, hung from their necks above each shriveled breast, rang like two anvils tapped by falling hammers as the steel-headed arrows smote them. So rained and rang the bolts of death upon the two opposing shields, and, when the sheafs were spent, their tawny, shrunken arms and shoulders were cut and pierced with gashes red and deep, and blood fell downward from their wounds as fall the first drops from a cloud before the thunder rolls; while at their feet the feathers from the broken shafts lay thick as plumage in a glade above whose turf two hungry, hunting eagles, swooping at one prey, have met in mad and disappointed swoop, and clinched. But by no bolt had either shield been pierced, and underneath the tough, protecting hides their old mad hearts, untouched, beat, hating, on.

Then rose a mighty murmur, and each line of battle, forgetful of its hate, swayed in around the fighters; for never on wild Ungava's stormy shore, where war had been for twice a thousand years, had there been seen by mortal eyes such dreadful fight before. It was as if these two old chiefs had burst their cerements of bark and risen out of graves, shriveled, dried, death-dumb, to fight, and show the younger men that gazed, how their old grandsires fought it out. The Trapper, leaning on his rifle not ten paces off, saw in the gloomy orbs of the old Chief the death light shine, and knew that this was his last battle. Thrice lifted he his rifle butt from sand, then drove it back. Thrice did his mighty fingers seek hatchet handle, then fall away, and with a groan he said: —

“Nay. Nay. It may not be. It is a mighty fight and fair. My God! it must go on! But his old eyes will never gaze again on the Great Rock of Mistassinni!”

Thus mingled were both wars. The Esquimau stood side by side with hated Nasquapee. Their painted faces almost touched as they stood thronged around the dreadful two whose hearts were hot with hate kindled in old fights fought on these barren shores before the warriors round them had been born.

Then the two fighters, grim and gray, with stately motion lifted their old hands, palm outward, and called mutual truce. Then signaled the gray Esquimau in dumb show to his tribe: —

“My children, here fight I my last fight. My fathers call me, and I go. The trail has waited long and I must tread it now. This chief and I have met before. With this right hand I tore his tongue from out his mouth. Lying half smothered in the brands, his hand launched knife at me, which passing through my face made my mouth dumb forever. We both have wrongs to right, and we will right them here. Take ye my body to that bold bluff where all my fathers sleep abreast of Anticosti. Lay me with them there, where I may hear the tides come roaring in and see the seals at play. Let there be wail for me as for an old-time chief among the tents which empty stand and will stand empty evermore beside the sea whose moan shall sound forever for a race forever gone. From this last field of mine bring into Spirit-Land such news of deeds and death as shall make welcome for you such as warriors give and get around those spirit fires which light the lodges of our sires beyond the northern sky. I, dying, give cheer to you about to die. So fare you well."

Then to the Trapper signaled his dumb friend: —

"Trapper, the trail is ready and I go. This Esquimau and I will end our quarrel here. The trail is long and lonely, but never yet hast thou failed dying man. I love thee, Trapper, for thou art true. No white is in thee. Thou art red. I shall not see thee ever after this. Thy trail runs to the front of Atla's throne; mine to my father's lodge. Tell her from me, that he who made her grave at Mamelons sent greeting to her when he died. Take thou my body to far Mistassinni and lay it in that Cave where sleep my sires and where forever sound the voices of the dead. When we have ended this, let these damned Esquimaux feel thy rifle butt and knife. At sunset, out of this last fray of mine, let both come forth well wet with brains and blood. It is my last behest. I love thee, Trapper, like a chief. So give me word and bond. May no knife ever girdle head of thine.* So fare thee well."

Then spake the Trapper: —

"Old friend, as thou hast said, so shall it be, if life holds with me after this. Thy greeting will I give her when we meet. Thy body will I bear to Mistassinni, and, in the Cave where sleep

---

* The best wish a red man can give one — not to be scalped. For he believes that if you lose your scalp you cannot enter the heaven of Chiefs.

thy sires, and where their voices sound forever, there shall it sleep. These dogs of Esquimaux shall feel my rifle butt and knife. From this last fray of thine they shall come forth both red and wet. I give thee word and bond. So lay on, Chief, and make thy vengeance sure. Thy heaven may not be mine; and so I bid thee long farewell, and give thee dying cheer."

Then once again the old gray haters faced, and their throats rattled, struggling with wild yells. Their sunken eyes glowed hot as burning coals. They dashed their shields to earth and stooped low down. Then drew their knives, long, bright, and keenly edged; sprang into air and met,—and struck. Each knife drove, heart-deep, home; and, as they fell apart, each bosom held the other's blade sunk 'twixt the ribs to the strong handle. So they died.

Then for a space was silence. Deep as death's, it hung above the host and stayed the pulses of the air. Then into it and through it, swelling slowly up and wavering on, the Indian wail arose, wild and weird, the saddest of all wailing ever sounded out of throat of woe. Quavering it swelled, lingered in long plaint, then died away in thinnest sound, and all the bloody plain was silent as the grave again. Then, suddenly, like crash of thunder in the breathless pause of some hot summer night, there burst a yell that ripped the silence into fragments. It burst from out a thousand throats as if the thousand had been joined in one, and through it hell had sent from out her caves its scream of hottest hate. Then deadly strife went down and rioted among them. Mixed and jammed they were together. Each man found foe beside him. No room for arrow or for spear was there. Each hand set fingers into nearest throat until their nails in torn flesh met. Then knives were plucked and reddened to the handles as they found flesh, and half the battle in the sand lay coiled and knotted like a field of snakes.

When rose the signal yell the Trapper's rifle cracked. Both barrels rang almost in twin report, and two tall chiefs sank brainless to the sand. Then, swinging heavy hatchet in mighty hand, into the jammed battle did he, headlong, plunge. Half through the thickened throng of fighting men he hewed his way. Through lifted shield his red axe sank to covered head and clove to shattered jaw. The warding spear shaft, gnarled and thick, shivered like rod of glass beneath his dreadful stroke. He warded neither knife nor spear. The terror of his arm was his defense. In his red wake the Nasquapees rushed in. They guarded safe and sure the back of their great friend. He knew it not. He only saw his thickening foes in front, and strode straight on. He grew in rage as grew the fight. In him war stood incarnate, fierce and red. The ancient dead fought in him. For o'er his head he heard the steady tramp of feet, and through the air the old Iberian murmurs ran. And 'mid the whiz of arrows, whirl of hatchets, crash of axes, and the thug of spears as they were driven home, he heard a voice he knew cry clear and loud:—

“Lay on, O Trapper, lay thou on! For the old Tortoise's sake,—whose son thou art, and king shalt be,—show thy full strength this day, and make good her right to name thee lord and master to the mighty warriors of her race, now gazing at thee, under lifted shields above Ungava. Lay on, I say, for tribal sign and her!”

Then he went wild. He cast his dreadful axe in air, and, clutching rifle by the muzzle, drove headlong at them. His mighty face, lean-featured, rigid, battle-white, sharp-set as flint edged for the pan, was horrible to see. His great, gray eyes, beneath his shaggy brows, were black as night, in whose black center lightnings burn and blaze.

From left to right — a mighty sweep — his heavy rifle swept. Stock, locks, and woodwork shivered as he struck, and flew in splinters wide cast. Around him centered all the battle. He was the battle. Ahead of him the Esquimaux rallied thick as bees in bush, when some intruding shock has burst the hive, and inner comb and dome of gray lie on the ground in patches. Through buckskin shirt and jacket stout their pelting arrows stung. They spotted him with blood. He felt no smart nor sting, but like a maddened lion ramped on. In Esquimaux no coward blood e'er flowed. They are a hardy stock, and all their lives are lived in peril. They breasted bravely up against him by the score, their coarse hair bristling and their small eyes adder-red. On shoulders broad and stout, on thickened skull and wide breastbone, the beveled barrels fell and crushed. He smote them down as thrasher's flail beats banded bundles on threshing-floor. With every stroke his breathing sounded wide. So fought he, and so they, quivering, died.

Then into the wild battle ran a figure clothed in black. At waist a tasseled cord was tied. His head was shaven bare. In high uplifted hand a silver crucifix gleamed white. Upon a pile of dead men, tumbled like jammed logs,—a dreadful heap of death,—the holy friar leaped and held high the sign of Calvary. Then Nasquapees and Esquimaux dropped on their knees and flung their weapons down. They knelt to Heaven's sign. With steady hand the holy man held silver cross on high, and to the dreadful slayer called: —

“Stay hand! Stay hand, thou dreadful man! For Holy Mary's sake and her dear Son's stay now thy bloody hand! Above this awful field I lift this sacred sign and bid this strife to cease. Let these poor men that live, go free.”

Then stood the Trapper. From dripping brow the battle sweat he wiped with one red hand, and, gripping hard the bloody and bent barrels in the other, said: —

“In yonder dell the tongueless chief of Mistassinni lieth dead. Between his ribs the driven knife still clings. In fair and mighty battle did he die. I was his friend. He knew his doom and bade me long farewell. He loved me like a chief, and therefore charged me, under word and bond, that I come forth from this last fray of his with rifle butt and knife well wet and red with brains and blood. I gave him word and bond, and joyfully he took the trail that led him to his sires.

“Bond and word have I kept on this full field. Above the dead and dying thou hast lifted sacred sign. I am a Christian man. Let, therefore, these damned dogs go hence alive. They owe me rifle,—barrels, stock, and locks, and hatchet flung high up, when in the air I heard her old-time people’s war cries ring, and caught the sound of charging feet above my head. I will collect my debt upon them on some other day. Aye, let the dogs go hence. I am a Christian man.”

So spake he. Then turned his back on priest and living foe, and, lining steps by the long row of bodies he had smitten down through bloody lane made by his awful rage, he came to where the silent Chief of Mistassinni lay silent evermore.

But when he came to where the old Chief lay, he started, for lo! amid the dead, robed in black furs from head to foot, a hood of night's jet blackness on her head, her serpent wand of twisted gold in hand, her face white as the snow, her great orbs fixed in mournful gloom upon the dead man's face, his withered hand in hers, there sat Ungava!

Then spake he, as he stood all dripping red, the wrath of battle in his blood and half its fierceness blazing in his eye: —

“Never on battle plain did I see dead so thick! I would that his old eyes had seen a man without a cross keep word and bond. This was last fray of his, and had he lived to see it foughten out, he would have had a tale to tell the chiefs he met as he burst into Spirit-Land that would have sent their hatchets whirling high in air as they gave warrior's welcome. Thou hast seen either world, but didst thou ever see such fight before, in living-land or dead-land, Ungava?”

Then she made answer. Sitting by the dead amid the dead, and lifting eyes of gloom to his great face, she said: —

“Fights many have I seen on sand and ice beneath a sun that neither set nor rose, and under lights no mortal hand e'er kindled in the North, which burned the unseen, rounded end of the world,—but never such a fight as this. Above you, as you onward hewed your way, the old-time dead stood thick as sedge at edge of salted streams in summer. Some were of my red race, for they waved hatchets over head, and on their naked bosoms, crimsoned bright, I saw the Tortoise sign. I knew the Totem, for often have I seen it on the breast of him, your friend, who saved the fight on the flat banks of Peribonka, where my father died. But others did I see, more vast of limb and huge; a giant throng, tall, big-breasted, lofty as pines, who, under oval shields bright as the sun, pure gold, their edges lifted high, gazed at you as you hewed on. And when, at last, thou didst cast hatchet high in air, and, bare-headed, without guard, didst beat them down with heavy rifle clubbed, and all its stock and polished woodwork into splinters flew, their mighty swords on golden shields did clash and such a roar went up as never lifted air of either world before. O dreadful man, it was a dreadful fight, and long and wild will rise the wail from maid and wife in the skin tents of Labrador, when from the North there shall be bruited down from tribe to tribe the tidings of this fray on far Ungava. God grant thee mercy,

Trapper, when in hour of need He reckons with thee for this dreadful day."

"So be it," gravely answered he. "God grant me mercy full and sure for sin done here or anywhere, when in my hour of need He reckons with me for this fray or other red ones I have fought in. Thou art a girl, Ungava, and canst not understand a warrior's soul in battle. I did give word and bond to this old chief, my friend, who for the length of warrior's life had walked the vocal world of God with silent mouth, shut off from all he loved and lived for by the great wrong done to him at the stake by the damned Esquimaux. Through savage circle, as they tortured, did I break when blazed the fire they lighted round him. This foot it was that cast the fagots wide, when, from the thongs cut by my knife, he fell headlong among them. For thirty years he lived seeking this day, his foe and chance. Foe and chance did he find on this far field, and mighty battle did he make, though age had whitened head and shriveled hand. Here, dying, did he put me under bond to right the wrong which he had borne for half a life. So stood the matter. I fought for friendship and for right, and God will grant me mercy, if, in battle fiercely set, I did in wrath strike one red blow too heavy or too many. So let it rest until I come to where the scales are poised for warriors and for wrongs righted in battle. I will bide issue like a Christian man, not doubting. Now will I lift this withered frame that once held mighty soul, and bear it to the cave where you shall fit it for long journey toward the grave which waits its coming at Mistassinni. For there, in that dread Cave where all his fathers sleep and where he will sleep the last of all thus chambered, must this old frame be laid : that Cave whose fame fills all the North, whose caverned passages, as you know, are filled forever with the voices and the murmurs of the dead.

“So now, old friend, on back of him who keepeth word and bond, from thy last field and fray thou shalt be borne. A heavier burden I have often carried, but never sadder. Ah me ! ah me ! the dead grow fast and friends grow few as life’s swift days fly on ! The Queen died on my breast. The Chief is dead. At Mamelons my sweet love sleeps. And now full half a thousand miles I go with him who made her grave, to his own grave at Mistassinni. Ungava, white of face but dark of soul, die not, lest out of that old Cave in the Great Rock I shall come forth into an empty world.”

Then tenderly the empty frame which once held mighty soul he lifted on his shoulders broad, and, casting one long look across the field whose fame would be his own till all the tribes died out, he went up toward the Conjuror's cave, which stood on the high cliff at whose worn base the great tides rush and roar. Him toiling on, Ungava followed, white of face but dark of soul, whose birth was out of mystery and under doom; whose magic was the wonder of the North; whose voice the dead obeyed; whose touch might heal or kill; whose serpent wand of gold was like that rod that Aaron cast at Egypt's feet; and with her in the cave he left the dead, that she, with strange preserving force, might make it fit for distant journey to its distant grave.

CHAPTER IX.

THE FAIRIES' FAREWELL TO UNGAVA.

“TRAPPER, behold the whiteness of the world. How still it lies, like angel sleeping on a couch of down plucked from the white swan’s breast. See how the moon wheels up her rounded orb from out the eastern sea, which whitens at her touch to her own beauty. The waves roll pearly pale and fling their spray in silvery showers far up the gleaming cliffs. The snow is whiter as her beams fall on it, and yonder icy islands shine like mirrors as they meet her face turned full upon them. All things are seen in distance, softly dim as some loved face that gazes at us in our dreams, through the gauze curtains which hang but for an hour between us, dreaming, and the spirit world; soon to be softly drawn aside for our own entrance within that peaceful realm where wait the angels, once our friends. Hark! to the low, soft note of mother-seals calling with sweet interrogation to their babes, safely sleeping in the crystal crevices of the ice. Was ever scene more peaceful?”

"It is, indeed, a peaceful scene, Ungava," replied the Trapper, "but barren to the eye of one who loves the stir of life, the motion of the world's activity, the busy hum of going and of coming, and the glow of human happiness. If one could people this pale realm with buoyant motion, set this still air to music, and make the moonlight dance, then might he say in truth, it were a perfect world produced by magic."

"O, thou of blinded eyes!" Ungava cried. "I did forget thou couldst not see, save as the orbéd sentinels on guard beneath the arches of thy beetling brows imperfectly report to thee. What, then, if I should give thee sight which brings the unseen world within my vision, and thou shouldst see the Fairies, Sprites, and Elves, the Gnomes and Witches, which people all this winter world, above, around, and underneath us, with frolic and with pleasure, as they hold nightly festival? Would such a sight please thee?"

"Thou art in joking mood," returned the Trapper, smiling. "There are no Fairies in the world; that is the faith of children."

"Children are wiser than the older folk, Trapper," returned Ungava, seriously. "They come as spirits out of spirit-land, and, taking forms of flesh, are subject to its limitations. O Trapper, this earthly form in which we live is but imprisonment; bondage to eyes which otherwise might see, and mask to our real faces. Through flesh we only show ourselves in glimpses. And the fond faith of children in the marvelous, to which they cling, is but the struggling of their souls against forgetfulness of that bright, animated world from which they came. And those who laugh at them, because of their sweet credence, are like those blinded ones — the Gnomes of under-earth — who, born in blindness, beyond the reach of light, laugh at our stories of the sun, and smile at us who do put faith in stars. Wouldst thou have eyes for once, O Trapper, and see what thou dost laugh at?"

"My eyes are fairly good," replied he, laughingly. "But if thou canst give better to me, then, let them come, Ungava."

"Nay, nay, thou skeptic," answered she, "I may not give thee eyes to see what is beyond thy ken at present; but I can command the spirits of the earth and air to take such form as shall upon the lenses of thine eyes cast full reflection, and so become objective to thy senses. They are compliant to me. Shall I call?"

“Aye, call, Ungava, call. If childhood’s faith in spirits by any chance be real, I would be child again,” he answered, smiling.

Then, as she stood, Ungava lifted wand, and suddenly around the two there grew a light far whiter than the moon. It came as dawn and day would come which had no flush of color. So came it round them as they stood upon the cliff above the lighted sea, which darkened with the contrast. So standing in the whiteness, Ungava called : —

“Come, Spirit and Sprite, Come laughing and dancing ;
Come out of the night,
To this white light come glancing.
Come, Elfin and Fairy ;
I form ring of magic ;
Come sing us some song,
Come dance us some dances.

“Come from sea and from land,
From deep earth and high heaven,
See, I lift now my hand,
The signal is given.
From the fires of the North,
From the foam of the sea,
From your caves now come forth
And appear unto me !”

Then, slowly, from a mound of snow that lifted dome of whiteness near to where they stood, a form of beauty did arise, clothed in soft vestments woven from whitest fleece and edged with fur of ermine. So into sight she rose, and with her other ones of equal beauty came and, standing in the brilliance, sang :—

I.

“ I am Queen of the Snow, of the pure white snow.
I eddy and circle and whirl as I go.
I am Child of the Frost. I am born above mountains;
I mantle the forest ; I cover the fountains.
I waver and fall, I stream and I flow,
With the currents of wind. I am beautiful snow !

CHORUS.

“ She is Queen of the Snow, of the pure white snow.
We flakes are her subjects : we whirl as we go ;
We eddy and circle ; we stream and we flow.
She is Child of the Frost. She is beautiful snow !

II.

“ When flowers are all withered, and their fragrance is fled ;
When the wild grape is fallen, and the green leaf is dead ;
When out of the forest the song-birds are flown,
And the harvest is reaped from the seed that was sown ;
Then, then, from the sky to the earth far below
I come down in mercy. I am beautiful snow.

CHORUS.

“When flowers are all withered, and their fragrance is fled ;
When the wild grape is fallen, and the green leaf is dead ;
Then, then, from the sky to the earth far below
She comes down in mercy. She is beautiful snow !”

So sang the elfin ones and vanished, and the white silence softly lay unoccupied on cliff and sea and shingled shore.

“Call yet again,” the Trapper cried. “Call yet again, Ungava ; for never yet did mortal eyes see lovelier sight, or mortal ears hear sweeter song.”

Then lifted she her wand once more, and waved it to and fro as one who beckoning calls.
And as the wand in easy circles moved, she,
smiling, sang : —

“Come, lily so white,
Come out of the night.
Come, rose-tree so red,
Bring wreath for my head.
Let the odor of hill,
Let the flower of the street,
Let the Spirits of bloom, Gather here to my feet.”

Then, even as she sang, out of the earth
there slowly rose a soft green lobe of monstrous size, and opening, lo! the Spirit of the Lilies, in its yellow heart stood forth revealed,—

then sang : —

THE SONG OF THE LILY.

I.

“ Have you breathed me by night, when on the still air Came the song of the lute, came the murmur of prayer?
Have you breathed me at morn, when the odorous trees
Were thrilled from their sleep by the kiss of the breeze?
Have you breathed me when mingled with mine was the breath
Of the woman you loved, and must love till death,
As her lips clung to yours, their caress to bestow,
While I lifted and sank on her bosom of snow?
If you have, then you know that no other such bloom
Blows for man or for woman 'twixt cradle and tomb.

II.

“ O, for love and for lovers my perfume is shed.
I am flower of the living, I am flower of the dead.
At the feasts of the rich, by the lovely and fair,
I am grouped in the cups, I am twined in the hair.
By the hand of the groom, ere he sleeps by her side,
My white leaves are sown on the couch of the bride.
And if she be taken, on the door of her tomb,
As a sign and a symbol, he chisels my bloom.
O, for love and for lovers, not since the sweet air
Has been breathed with their sighs has there been flower so fair.

III.

"I am old as the world. When the Stars of the morn Sang together for joy, for their joy I was born.
In the dawn of the world, when women were given In their sweetness to men, I was dropped down from heaven,
To be charm for their charms, and a potion, for never Did a lover love once, and not love forever,
The woman that wore me on her bosom the night
When he knelt at her feet in love's wild delight.
O, for love and for lovers, not since the sweet air
Has been breathed with their sighs has there been flower so fair.

IV.

"When the Sons of God chose from the daughters of men
The sweetest and fairest to be wives to them, then Thy race did begin. When thy first mother was wed,
The stars were made floral to be wreath for her head.
Since then I have come, both for bridal and bier,
When wand has been lifted, or song sung to appear.
Ungava, Ungava, am I needed as breath
In the sweetness of life, or the faintness of death?
O, tell me, for ne'er since thy race breathed the air
For love and for lovers has there been flower so fair."

Then silence; and in it lingered long the dying strain, sinking as sinks at death, perhaps, our memory of other days, which we in dying leave regretfully, so sweet they were to us in living, filled to the brim like jocund cup with wit and laughter and love's sweet wine. Then, strangest sight that magic ever gave to wondering mortals,— around the two, on that high cliff, there spread a lawn of emerald, dewy and fresh, in which were floral mounds and clumps of roses whose wealth of bloom weighed the strong bushes down; and hedges fenced it in whose every twig was odorous, and every bush and bloom and leaf was vital. For from this forest sweet a group of fairy, elfin forms, each garlanded with her own flower, came gliding forth and made obedience to Ungava. Then, standing round her, sang: —

THE SONG OF THE ROSES.

I.

“Queen of our hearts, by stream and hill,
We heard thy magic summons thrill.
Queen of our hearts, in bower and hall,
We caught the sweetness of thy call.
From Southern pool and stream afar,
We, guided by the Northern Star,
Have come our homage here to give,—
For thee we live ! For thee we live !

II.

“Last of that race, whose bridal morn
Was ushered in when we were born ;
Last of that race to which we gave,
To sweeten bridal bed and grave,

Our sweetest breath, our fullest bloom ;
And laid on cradle and on tomb,
The richest offering we could wreathe,—
For thee we breathe! For thee we breathe!

III.

“Last of thy race! thy eyes of night
Hold in their depths the farther sight.
We are of earth, and may not know
The feeling in thy breast of snow.
We wait thy will. We do not dare
To crown thy head, to wreathe thy hair,
Nor garland waist with bridal zone ;
Still do we live for thee alone.

IV.

“Last of thy race! perchance ’twill be,
That we thy face no more shall see.
At Mamelons, on breast of snow,
A snow-white lily lieth low ;
There on that dreadful hill of fate
Sweet Atla saw her morning break ;
But know, in life or death, that we Still breathe for thee! Still breathe for thee!”

Then died the tender strain, and singers faded with the song, and once again the white silence softly lay unoccupied on cliff and sea and shingled shore. Then she, as waking out of trance, raised eyes of tender gloom to his and said:—

“Trapper, behold the sky! What eye may count the stars which to the thoughtful soul do punctuate its spaces with interrogations? Canst thou believe that all those shining points which powder it with golden dust are worlds, inhabited like ours? See how the o'erarching dome is all bespangled with fretted fire. What noble roofment has this little earth thus canopied with glory! Tell me, hast thou a star in yonder sky which thou dost call thy own? A star linked with a loved one's face?"

Then in reply the Trapper:—

"Nay, nay, I am not fanciful, Ungava. I am a plain, blunt man. I know my friends. My foes know me. My loves are simple. I am a man of fact, not fancy. I eat my food. I quench my thirst. I love my friend. I hate my foe. Word and bond keep I unto death. The rest I leave to God."

"But, Trapper, lift thou thine eyes again. Select some star, distant or nigh, and to it link a name—the name of her thou lovest over all. Let its bright ray be to thine eyes a face, and tell me of her. I would know the woman thou dost love."

"The woman I do love, Ungava, lives not in any star. She lives—I know not where. I know not where to find her when I die. I only know she loves me with a queenly love; and when my eye grows dim and all the trail fades out, I trust her faithful hand will guide me on. I know no further, and I have no further hope."

"But, Trapper, if thy love is dead and gone — forever gone — and where she is thou knowest not, nor how to find her, nor whether you and she shall ever meet, if all is dim, uncertain, dubious, — then thou canst surely love some other one — some fair, sweet one, who should give all her soul to thee; be comfort to thy days, and to thy face lift eyes of worship because to her thou art as God."

Then said the Trapper, gravely: —

"Ungava, of little loves man may have many, born of his vagrant moods or transient passions; for man is as the earth, and out of him, prolific, spring many growths, some sweet, some foul, which, whether sweet or foul, are only of a day, and die. But one great love, and only one, may be to man who stands large natured and with powers too strong to die. Such love is central to him. Rooted in his soul it lives with it forever, and all the sweetness and the strength of him are in it as the sap is in the tree. So flower and fruit come from it, and such high ornament as make him glorious evermore. Such love did come to me, and in my soul I feel it growing more and more. One love I have, and only one. Another one I may not have, nor wish. It fills me as a cup is filled with water when its brim is wet. I drink of it, and, drinking the sweet draught, I thirst not, and I need no more."

And as he spake, yea, as the words were on his lips, across the moon there grew a cloud, that darkened all the world. Black grew the sea, and heaving without cause from out the darkness came a moan, and a great wave rode in upon the darkness, and underneath the cliff broke with a fall that shook it; then, silence.

Then said Ungava, speaking softly in the gloom: —

"Trapper, thy heart is fixed, and fixed too is my fate. Within the cave for seven days will I do solemn service. Then enter in, and thou shalt find him ready for the trail by which his body thou shalt bring to Mistassinni. There wilt thou find me by the Cave that none may enter. There, with the mighty of his race and mine, shall he find sepulture. I would not change thy steadfast soul. It is enough for me as woman to have known thee and have loved. Thou art of ancient time. To word and bond, and nobler yet to love, living or dead, thy soul holds true. Long is the trail, but heart of truth makes tireless foot. Once more at Mistassinni we must meet. There shall we come to fate and its sad end. There shall we make last parting; and such parting will it be as never on this earth was made before! So fare thee well."

So said she, and then vanished. Then passed the cloud, the moon came forth, and, on the crest of that high rock above the sleeping sea, he stood alone, while the white silence once more softly lay unoccupied on cliff and sea and shingled shore. And as he through the solemn silence slowly downward went he murmured to himself: "Die not, Ungava, lest from that Cave in the Great Rock I shall come forth into an empty world. Alas! alas! I would my feet might never tread the trail that leads to Mistassinni." *

---

* We expect to publish "Mistassinni," the third and concluding Idyl in this series, next year.

THE AUTHOR.

END.

SUPPLEMENTARY NOTES.

SUPPLEMENTARY NOTES.

---

THE SAGUENAY.

I HAVE been often asked to give a picture of the Saguenay — a picture in words. Would that I were able to do it, for then would you who read, behold the most impressive spectacle of Nature. For such another river or stream there is not on this wide earth of ours, either as measured by those physical features or signs which are seen of the eye or by the solemn impression which it makes upon the soul. But I am not able. Words are inadequate. There is in human speech no capacity to mirror forth the majesties of such a theme. The theme, the mighty theme, is there between the awful cliffs washed forever by an awful tide, and there it will wait, unvoiced, until some future Bryant shall be born, inspired to write the Thanatopsis of the Saguenay. No. I cannot picture the Saguenay. I can only tell something of it, hoping it may interest and prompt my readers to visit this strange — this strangest of earthly rivers.

And, first of all, I know not what to call this Saguenay. Rivers have banks, but it has none; for lofty and precipitous cliffs, mountains of rock, precipices that rise a thousand feet sheer upward from the tide, and beetling crags,—these cannot, without misuse of language, be called river banks. Nor is it fit to call it a stream, for a stream is a line of flowing water smaller than a river, and the Saguenay is from one and a half to two miles wide, and from 400 to a thousand feet in depth, and all this monstrous depth of water is in motion. Nor is it an outlet merely, for into it flows the surplus water of Lake St. John. But this lake is shallow, not deep, and but little more than half the length of the Saguenay, and hence its flowage, large as it is, is but a tithe, nay, only a hundredth part, of what the latter holds and pours into the St. Lawrence daily. Hence, if we call the Saguenay a river, it is not because that word describes it or is a proper title to it, but because of its strange characteristics. It stands an anomaly in nature, and there is no better name to give it than to call it a river.

Its waters are colored, nor is their color like to any other river I have ever seen. They have been called black by many writers who have written of them, but they are not black, save when looked at in volume, but rather a transparent brown, like as common water is when viewed through smoked glass. I say transparent, for they are very pure and clear, and, dark as they are, the eye sees deeply and easily into them. A white stone or piece of tin can be seen at a great depth—as deeply down as they might be in the waters of the Horicon, which have been called the purest and the cleanest in the world. Moreover, the sunbeams penetrate its dark-brown current easily, and the long lanes of light shot into its somber depths by the solar rays look as the sunlight looks when shining through the stained windows of cathedrals. Whence its waters get this strange quality, this indescribable and sinister tinge none can say and savants do not even pretend to guess, for all the currents which flow into it are mountain streams and crystalline, and the contributions of the sea which the tidal lift pours into it are clear and blue of tint. Nor can it come from any coloring matter released by nature's chemistry acting upon its rocky walls and bottom, for the nature of these is known, and plain granite quartz and gneiss are the dominant structures. But whatever be the cause of it the color of its waters is, as I have described, a brown, with almost a purple tinge, and has to the eye, seen from a distance, a most gruesome look, gloomy and sinister, as if it came from some other world than ours, whose waters are pure and sparkling.

Imagine, now, a vast volume of this strange-looking water two miles in width, a thousand feet in depth, pouring out from a monstrous opening between contiguous mountains, made by some mighty throe of nature, travelling in agony, to bring forth an awful birth; an opening which is not simply a rent made through a lofty range, but as if a long, high ridge of primeval rock — rock old as the beginning of the world — running north and south, had been split along its entire length of sixty miles, exactly in the center, and the two halves, wedged violently apart until the jagged, precipitous, cavernous sides stood two miles asunder, and through this tremendous opening, through the very center of this huge rent in the rocks, a deep, almost fathomless volume of gloomy colored water began to flow, and you have in your mind a fairly good picture of what the Saguenay was at its birth, and what it is to-day. For, of all rivers on the globe, this from necessity has changed the least. Here and there the frost and heat, the snows and rain of ten thousand years have worn down the sharp edges and rounded the flinty verge of overhanging precipices; here and there the wash and wear of centuries have deposited so much of soil that trees can find a foothold; but save this all is to-day on either hand, as you sail up its darkling tide, as it was when, first born in nature's darkest hour, its gloomy currents began to boil and whirl and flow. Every other river on the face of the earth has changed its banks and bed, but this strange river has changed not at all and cannot change until the end of time.

No wonder that the ancient mariners gazed with awe at the gloomy portal through which its sinister-looking current pours into the St. Lawrence. No wonder that they shrank from entering between its monstrous banks, such as no man had ever seen on earthly river before. No wonder that their superstition pictured it as an outlet of the kingdom of darkness, and that the ship which ventured for any distance through the awful opening would never more come back.

This superstition was deepened and confirmed by a strange and sad event. For Roberval, a noble of France, a favorite at court and beloved of the King, a true sailor, and as brave a soul as ever faced death on land or sea, sailed in a great strong ship, with a stout company, into the Saguenay. He sailed in, and with him went the prayers and fears of many a brave man and saintly woman, for in old France he was known and loved of many, and the King's favorite; he sailed in, he and his stout company, determined to penetrate the mystery beyond and read the riddle of this Stygian Sphinx. Thus bravely he entered the grim portals of the Saguenay when the dark tide was at its flood, and on it, floating upward, he disappeared from the eyes of those who, from the rocky point below what now is called L'Anse à l'Eau, stood watching him. Full many a day the watchers on that stony point stood waiting for his return, but nevermore did Roberval come back, nor was he ever seen of men, he nor his crew, nor of them did a word of tidings ever come. It was, in truth, a startling disappearance and an awful fate, and long it was before another ship went up the darkling stream. But sailors said — and for a hundred years the saying was believed—that once each year, in the old of the moon, when winds were high, the ship of Roberval, with Roberval at the helm, would come sailing out of the Saguenay—sailing down with the ebb, and at the flood it would sail up again; and, no matter which way the winds would blow, the sails of that ghostly ship were always full—full of winds that were not as earthly gales. And so Roberval's ship became the specter of the Saguenay. But of him and his company no tidings ever came, nor do we of to-day know, nor can we surmise, whither they went or where they died, save this—and it is a most strange thing—that 250 years after Roberval and his ship went up the Saguenay a priest visiting on holy errand the wandering tribes that still inhabit the desolate region to the north of Lake St. John found, on the Misstassinni river, and near the lake of that name, deeply buried in those interminable woods, the ruins of a fort, and within the inclosure of the walls, as once they stood, two ancient cannon with the royal stamp of France upon them, and certain other relics of use and ornament such as were in fashion centuries ago. Such was the strange discovery that he made. And the question arises with startling force: Was not this Roberval's fort, that he built at the farthest point of his persistent exploration, at the coming on of winter? Was it not here, in the very depth of that dreary waste of wilderness which stretches from Lake St. John to the shore of Hudson's Bay, that he and his men from starvation perished, and is not the ruined fragment of this stockade, thus strangely found, brave Roberval's monument—the ruined monument of the first white man that ever steered a ship up the Saguenay's dark tide? I hope some day to see this ruin in the woods and find, if possible, some clue which shall connect it with the mystery of the Saguenay.

The Indians called this marvel of waters by many names, for many tribes lived on it or its tributaries. Each seems to have called it by a different name, but all agreed in the naming of its mouth, and they called it Mamelons, or the Place of Great Mounds. The reason of this is as plain to the eye to-day as it was in the olden time, for the monstrous mountains of rock which guard its entrance are rounded at the summit and domed like nature's cathedrals; and more suggestive yet, perhaps, to many are the great sand hills, all of pure golden color, which are at the eastern side of its entrance, round about the little plateau on which Tadousac stands. These mountains of sand are the old beaches of geologic ages, left as the waters retired from the face of the earth above the retreating waves, and they stand four tiers deep one above the other, like the galleries of an immense amphitheater, once perfect but now in ruins, and of which only an arc remains. First is the modern beach, on which the fishermen haul their boats and bare-legged children play, burrowing in the warm yellow sand and making, with shouts of glee, their sand castles. Then a hundred feet above is another and an ancient beach, and on this the present village stands. Above this rises another and a higher one, vast of size and lofty, all sand, gravel, and smoothly rounded cobble of many colors, some beautiful; and above this most ancient relic of primeval world-creating action curves yet another and a larger; and over all the great dome. And this is why the Indians called the Saguenay's mouth Mamelons, or the Place of Great Mounds.

I climbed one day a thousand feet of toilsome ascent that I might stand upon the uppermost beach of that old-time sea level that saw the birth of the world, and whose sands made music when the stars of the first morning sang together, that I might feel the age of it, and from its shining height behold the sublime spectacle that the growth of the world, growing through all the numberless ages since those sands were sifted there, had made for the eye of man, who is but of a day, to see. I searched this old-time silt with curious eye to find some shell of mollusk, some tiny fragment of pearl, some hint of birth, of life or death. I digged pits in it and fingered the sand and granulations of primeval rocks interrogatively, but not a relic or fragment or trace could I discover on that bright, wind-blown altitude that when its fine grains were piled high as a mountain by billows that found on them their first shore, that life was. But on the beach next lower to this loftiest, earliest one I found, by searching, proof that life had come to the deep sea depths when it was made, and, as I measured the distance between the two, I wondered how many centuries or ages that distance of shrinkage of the waste of waters whose shrinking swelled the world's growth represented. Verily, I said to myself, as I knelt in the sand over a little pit I had digged seekingly, and gazed down upon the dark tide of the Saguenay, rolling a thousand feet below me, as if I were looking through a thousand centuries of time,—verily, man is as grass. In the morning it springeth up and in the evening it is cut down and withereth. Below me flowed the two great rivers, the one wide and playful and sunlighted as is life, the other narrow, dark, and motionless as death. Their two tides met and contended for mastery, but I noted that after a short, fierce struggle, the deep and dark one yielded to and was covered up forever by the wide and sunny one, and I said: Lo, here beneath me are the two symbols which represent what men most think of and what they most love and hate — life and death — and death is swallowed up in victory!

Another peculiarity of the Saguenay, which adds to its impressiveness, is the absence — the almost total absence — of life upon it. For forty miles the yacht sailed on between the mountainous sides, and from the mouth to Cape Eternity, save the white porpoises near the entrance, I never saw a bird or fish or animal of any kind. It was in truth a solemn sail. The pilot said scarcely a word during the entire passage, and I sat at the helm and steered, silently looking. The wind was strong, blowing straight up between the lofty sides as through a funnel, with the force of half a gale, and the yacht raced through the black water, leaving a long wake of white froth astern; but being sharp at the stem and narrow in her lines she cut the dark current like a knife, noiselessly. Once I thought I saw a seal's head, but it vanished and I was not sure, and in all that forty miles of flight, wind-driven, with the August sun shining brightly in the sky, I saw no gull flying overhead, no loon upon the water, no hawk or eagle circling above the lofty cliffs, nor any animal, whether small or great, moving along the shores. Surely it was a strange sail and I could only look and marvel at the solitude through which I was so noiselessly passing. And as I thus went sailing up this indescribable river, mile after mile in silence, the yacht with every sail swelled taut cleaving the black water at racing speed, the mighty walls of rock on either hand, no living thing in sight, the wide space ahead as silent as if I were steering into a silent world, my wonder grew; for it was not until we had sailed on, in this strange fashion, for fifty miles and had come in view of Cape Eternity and Cape Trinity, that the climax of this most extraordinary and, I may truly say, most impressive passage, was reached.

Cape Eternity—who named it thus I know not—stands on the left side of the river, going up. It is a mighty ridge of solid rock, scarred and seamed by ten thousand years of frost, by ten thousand years of storm; a gigantic milepost, which marked in the beginning, marks to-day, and will mark forever the earliest progress of earthly time. Its substance is primeval, having eternity for its parent, and hence rightly named. Sheer upward it lifts its monstrous bulk from the black water for 1800 feet; and sheer downward it sinks, as plummet proves, below the black water, to its invisible foundations. What power save God's could heave it up, what power save His could level and adjust its immovable base? Some writers have pictured it as bare, bald rock. It is not so. Life finds rooting in its seams and crevices and level places; mosses, and vines, here and there a wildwood flower, lichens also, and its dome, otherwise terrible, is divinely softened with forests that wither not in foliage, but are forever green and full of pungent smells that sweeten the gales which blow around it.

Directly opposite, a half a mile perhaps in distance, stands Cape Trinity, another monstrous cliff of equal height, more abrupt in form, divided along its awful front into threefold shape, suggesting its name. Its front is verdureless. Its rigid lines are unsoftened by flower or shrub, or root, or gnarled bunch of stunted life. Austere, impenetrable, strong, it stands facing Eternity, giving no sign or hint of what it means, a voiceless, heartless, impenetrable mystery, like that doctrine which human ingenuity has invented and framed into the structure of modern theology to explain what is inexplicable—the status and functions of Deity, whose nature, because of the feebleness of human understanding, is and must forever be to us, save in its mercies and rectitudes, beyond our understanding. “Who by searching can find out God?”

Between these two majestic and awful formations of nature the waters of the Saguenay flow inward for half a mile or more, until they meet the mountain slope again, and this recess or curvature is called Eternity Bay, and never before in all my wanderings, on river or lake, or in the deep loneliness of unfrequented woods, did I find a spot too lonely to camp in. But here, even in daytime, the soul is oppressed and weighed down by the solemn surroundings, and when the moon comes up above the far cliffs across the mournfully colored stream, and on the one hand you behold the majestic symbol of eternity and on the other the awful embodiment of the mind-racking mystery called Trinity,—both looming up above the black expanse of water flowing on forever deep, strong, and resistless as death, both revealed as sure and awful facts, but dim to the eye as is our knowledge of the hereafter,—the soul is overwhelmed and the mind shrinks within the enclosure of its mortal cells as the blood, in fright, shrinks within the creeping veins. Surely only the highest human levity, or piety rapt in holy meditation, could camp a week in the awful curvature of Eternity Bay.

THE ST. LAWRENCE.

---

UPON the northern boundary of our country is a river of vast length and size. Its fountain head is in no petty spring, but in immense lakes, so deep and vast that geography has named them inland oceans, and declares that one of them is the largest body of fresh water in the world. This mighty river of the north rolls its current toward the sea from month to month, from year to year, from age to age, unshrunk by summer's torrid heat, or winter's Arctic cold, with a movement too vast for the extremes of climatic changes to affect it, pulseless and level as the Hindu dreams eternity may be, save where it thunders as over the verge of a world into Niagara's caldron, or shoots down its awful declines swiftly as steam-driven engines may roll. Its water is pure and sweet as springs upon the mountains are, nor can the entrance of a hundred turbid tributaries soil its rolling purity. I have boated on its current a thousand miles, and drunk its water as men drink from wells. At places it narrows to a mile in width, and again its banks are twenty leagues apart, so that a day's sailing can scarcely ferry you from shore to shore. For a thousand miles it makes the beneficent boundary of two nations whose millions hardly know of it, and whose governments neglect it, and yet these nations without it would be robbed of a glory and a gain that they do not now appreciate. The market timber for half the globe is floated down its majestic stream to serve men's needs; its islands, in number and beauty, are the marvel of all travelers; its banks, from mouth to fountain head, are lined with human habitations; the ships of nations are cradled on its bosom; the oldest city on the continent is on its banks, and history, when seeking the beginning and cause of momentous events, must search the early records of this mighty stream. This river, this paragon of rivers, I need not say, is the St. Lawrence!

Its tide is fed from remotest sources. This drop has come from the beach at Fort William Henry on Lake George, and this started from Whitehall on its long journey northward. Half of this cup I drink fell from the clouds among the lilies of the upper Saranac, and the other half flowed from the springs of far Dakota.

This patch of foam was churned in the awful caldron of Niagara, and that white pine chip yonder was blown by a prairie gale from a joiner's shop on the wharf at Chicago. Lake Superior is here, and Michigan, Huron, and Erie, Lake George, Champlain, and Memphremagog, and all the Adirondack lakes that flow through the Raquette, Grass, St. Regis, and Saranac rivers, are they not here beneath me? And what shall we say of all the great rivers that drain the vast watershed to the west and north, even to that remote point whence streams flow towards the pole — the Ottawa, the Maurice, the Mistassinni, the Richelieu, Chaudière, Montmorenci, and Saguenay's gloomy tide — all these many waters, from ten thousand sources, remote, inaccessible, have come, obedient to her summons, to swell her triumph as she rolls in majesty toward the great ocean, that even changes its mighty tides to please her. Great river of the north, wide as La Plata, more lovely than the Rhine, more abundant than the Mississippi, defiant of extreme climatic changes, thou flowest on and downward toward the sea, pulseless and self-confident as a bride, when, conscious of her matchless beauty, she moves with stately motion to the welcome of her lover. No river is like to this majestic stream on all the globe — so supreme in its physical characteristics, so historic in its associations, so rich in legends of other days, and through these so suggestive of a prehistoric past, whose civilizations have perished, and whose people have passed away. Memorial river, the air above the changeless tide, too vast to shrink, too vast to swell, is haunted with mighty shades whose names we know! Cartier, Champlain, Frontenac, Laval, La Salle, Joliet, Hennepin, Brebœuf, Montgomery, Wolfe, Montcalm, Lord Durham, greatest of statesmen, and back of these vast luminaries who light the pages of history are other shades, innumerable, nameless, countless, mythical; as back of sun and moon and known planets, remote, mysterious, are countless points of fire, which science cannot count, much less trace their orbits. For since the continent was this mighty river has been, and been ever the same, equal, majestic, marvelous stream.

QUEBEC.

---

CANADA has within her limits many wonders, but not one more unique than the city of Quebec. I have visited it many times, and can tell you precisely what it is. Quebec is a cluster of houses framed two centuries ago in medieval Europe and put together on the banks of the St. Lawrence. A city without streets, but creased with multitudinous passages. A city like a huge vine, its roots running under a river, and its branches clambering over and clinging to the front of a gigantic rock. A city of old, weather-beaten houses riveted into the sides of a ledge like the rusty heads of iron nails driven centuries ago into the planking of an oaken door. A city of quaint appearances and ancient expressions that has never aged because it was old when it was born; an unique repetition in young America of wrinkled Europe; an anachronism of a thousand years in time; a misplacement of a thousand miles in space; an injection of the fifteenth century into the bosom of the nineteenth; old wine in new veins—how pure the wine, how shriveled the veins! queer, suggestive, antique, misplaced Quebec! But how much it has seen, and in what a magnificent drama it has played chief part! It is a city of such historic memories that the Genius of History might be pictured as a martial figure on her mighty rock, standing guard over her incomparable scrolls. For in her streets every house has its story; every stone a voice, while every avenue and alley is peopled more densely with the shades of the dead than with the bodies of the living. Memorable figures meet you at every turn. From Durham Terrace, looking down, you behold Jacques Cartier pacing the deck of his little ship as it lies anchored on the bosom of the river below. You see where the pure and persistent soul of Champlain passed from earth, and where, with loving hands and mournful hearts, they buried his body on that sad Christmas morn. In the gloaming you meet the martial figure of the fiery Frontenac approaching. Through the growing darkness La Salle flits silently past with his gaze turned toward the far south and the mouth of the Mississippi, which his soul longed to see, and which, seeking through a thousand perils, he saw with joy at last; and you think of the unknown grave where his bones moulder beneath the flowers of the Texas prairie. Here, Wolfe, amid the roar of battle, died. From this spot the spirit of Montcalm flew upward. What a meeting the two heroic souls — beyond wars and warring — had, within the peaceful boundaries of the skies at last! There, Montgomery fell, and in this little house lay his body frozen stiff as ice. Yonder, the Jesuits planned, in holy councils, their great missionary undertakings, and you gaze with hushed breath at the skull of the brave Brebœuf tortured to death, on the shore of far Lake Huron, by those for whom he would gladly die. Cartier, Champlain, Frontenac, Laval, Brebœuf, Wolfe, Montcalm, Montgomery, all lived upon this rock which we call Quebec! What a city! What a history! A pivotal city around which two hostile civilizations circled and swung, repellent, antagonistic,— one centered on the salvation of souls; the other on the State and the well-being of countless generations of men.

DURHAM TERRACE.

---

THEY call it Dufferin Terrace now, and against this later nomenclature I make earnest protest. Lord Dufferin is very much of an Irish gentleman, suave in manner, felicitous of speech, and with that most admirable of gifts, the gift of so acting and speaking as to please everybody — a diplomat withal of large experience and known ability. We of this age who have knowledge of Canadian and English politics all know Lord Dufferin, and are ready to say pleasant things of him. But when one speaks the name of Lord Durham, he mentions the name of a man who has exerted a most commanding influence, not only in Canadian matters but upon the colonial development of the English-speaking race all over the world. It is to Lord Durham that Canada owes her self-government and deliverance from the vexatious and unjust interference in her local affairs of parties and persons who knew nothing and cared nothing for her interests, three thousand miles away. It was against such injustice and insolence of courtly cabals and agents that Canada in 1837 rebelled. Men who would not be slaves to foreign masters rose in arms, and blood was shed for native rights and liberty. The Canadians had been grievously wronged and insulted for years, and at last the heat which had been slowly growing hotter reached the point of ignition, and all Canada suddenly blazed red with rebellious fire. The rebellion was put down by force of arms, but brute force settles nothing, and the merits of the question still remained unsettled. But above prison walls where Canadian patriots lay waiting judgment and death, the wrongs of Canada loomed up, and in such vast proportions that England, across the distance of three thousand miles, saw it, and saw it as a matter that must be righted if England was to keep her largest colony. It was then that Lord Durham was appointed, with full power, to examine into Canadian grievances and submit a plan to Parliament by which a lasting and satisfactory settlement might be reached. Thus chosen to examine into the whole matter broadly and report, he came. The question was not merely one affecting Canada alone, but one which reached to the very roots of English colonialism. The interrogation to be answered was, "How shall England so govern her colonies as to retain their willing allegiance?" This question Lord Durham answered in his celebrated report — answered clearly and fully, so answered it that liberty was given to Canada and all English colonies forever. He advised that all local interests and rights be in the control of local legislatures and locally elected officers; that all law-makers and all executors of the laws be chosen by the people; in short, that Canadians should govern Canada, and that only in questions which related to the harmony and well-being of the whole empire should the sovereignty of Parliament and England have control. In brief, he advocated Canadian home rule, in the fullest sense of the word, and, furthermore, that this policy be adopted by the mother country in respect to all her colonial possessions that were and were to be. His views were, of course, ahead of his age. His famous report was ridiculed and denounced. He himself was made to suffer for his justice and his wisdom. He died soon after; died in neglect of the court, and, as some say, broken-hearted; died saying: "Canada will yet appreciate my efforts in her behalf and do justice to my memory." But in all Canada I know of no monument or shaft erected in memory of him to whom she owes incomparably more than to any other man who ever lived or lives to-day; nor do I know of any inscription, even, or memorial stone, which would suggest to the tourist or to her own youth this great man and his great deed in her behalf. Only here, in the name of Durham Terrace, at Quebec, is the student of Canadian history reminded by anything in Canada that Lord Durham ever lived or suffered for Canadians; and even this faint evidence of having knowledge, appreciation, or conscience they have wiped away, covering the monumental and forever luminous name of Durham over under the thin, smooth, highly polished veneer of Dufferin! How nobly it pays to labor for the people! The memories of Lord Durham recall his father-in-law, Lord Elgin, a statesman of great abilities and of great renown. If Durham was more brilliant, Elgin was more practical. The one was like our Jefferson; the other like our Trumbull. If the one was gifted to see the theoretical connection of liberty with good local government, the other apprehended clearly the actualities of the case, and the real solution of the problem viewed in the light of actual politics. The nervous, brilliant, far-sighted Durham blazed out the future course of Canadian progress; the sober-headed, solid-minded Elgin went to work to macadamize that trail into a broad highway, along which the people might move the car of advancing development easily and safely onward. And what did Canada give to Lord Elgin in return for all his toil and generous pains in its behalf? Applause in thronging streets, public thanks, and monumental fame? Nay, not so; that would be unlike the people! What did philanthropic Boston give Garrison in 1856? Some of us can remember. She put a halter around his neck and mobbed him through the very street where Shattuck fell for liberty in 1775. And they who did it? Why, hoodlums, you say, the riffraff of North End and South Cove, the devils of the city. Not so. The mob who tried to hang Garrison for saying that a negro had rights, was composed of men who wore broadcloth coats and seven dollar hats, and owned the best pews in the churches. Come and tell me,—for some of you can remember,—what did Alton give Lovejoy for advocating liberty to the negro in his little paper? A bloody grave. And if there be among my readers a man who fought for freedom under Lincoln, let him say what Virginia, the birthplace of presidents,—of Washington, of Jefferson, of Madison, of Monroe, —gave to old John Brown in 1860, and he will tell you that she gave him the gallows. And what did Canada give Lord Elgin in return for all his toil and care for her and her future? They stoned him through the streets of Montreal; they splashed the vice-regal carriage with rotten eggs and mud; they hooted him from square to square; they chased him, howling like drunken savages as they were, to the very doors of his beautiful home; they insulted him, their benefactor, in every shameful way that coarse ruffianism could suggest. And in all Canada to-day there is no praise or honor shown these two great governor-generals — the only two great ones she ever had — save the fact that each has had a petty county named after him. And this magnificent esplanade — the most magnificent in the world — once bore the name of Durham! I beg to suggest to the Canadian people, her journalists, and public men, that Durham county be changed to Lorne, and Elgin to Lansdowne, and so would they have done forever with the only two monumental names that the foreign students of their country's history can find on all the pages written since the English conquest!

The view from Durham Terrace is fine beyond description. Two hundred feet below the river flows with a steady, stately movement, suggestive of great depth and volume. It seems to say, "I carry in my current a third of the fresh water of the globe." Sheer beneath you, as a plummet drops, is the Lower Town. See, there is where the bullet, in the darkness of the night, as he went charging forward, pierced the body of Montgomery—that fatal bullet which lost Canada to the great Republic, and cost her half the progress of a hundred years. Observe the long wharves, wharves so finely built that it makes a New Yorker ashamed of his city as he thinks of its rickety piers. The wharves are here, but where are the ships that should be loading and unloading at them? Ask the opponents of Union with the States—Canada's natural commercial partner and market. Perhaps they can tell you. Lift your eyes to the far side of the great stream where are the fortified ridges of Point Levis, and beyond these, dimly blue, the mountains that make the boundary of Maine. Was there ever a grander sight?

But it was not of the landscape, vast, varied, and magnificent as it is, that I was thinking, last summer, as I gazed outward, from that magnificent promenade, but rather that I was standing almost on the site of the Old Chateau de St. Louis.

What made it noted? Why, Champlain built it, to start with, and from it, as a regal center, all the old French governors exercised their immense sovereignty—a sovereignty that extended from the Gulf of St. Lawrence up the great river through the lakes, and thence down the Mississippi to Orleans, lashing the northern and the southern gulf together as with a chain cable. What an empire that! What a long arm the old French power on this continent once had, and what a brain back of the power!

For you must remember that the banner which, two centuries ago, streamed from the Chateau de St. Louis, on whose site the Durham Terrace now is, waved over a succession of forts that protected a line of occupation four thousand miles in extent, bisecting the con-continent, both halves of which, the men, soldiers, priests, sailors, pioneers, who met in the old building, bravely hoped France and the Church would one day own. What midnight watches were held here; what councils called; what schemes devised; what mighty undertakings planned! Marshals of France, fresh from European victories; Jesuit fathers, with the scars of Indian tortures on their bodies, but with courage undaunted because drawn from on high; admirals of the Lily; Huron chiefs; converts to the faith; trappers braving death in search of gain, and pious women who had left the court itself to teach the savage daughters of the woods! Ah, me — what gatherings they had in the old building that stood here, even up to 1834! All this in the old French days. But later on, after Wolfe had climbed the heights of Abraham, and English power entered the old Chateau, then it became the symbol of a greater sovereignty, and wider dominion yet, for Wolfe died in 1757, nigh twenty years before the colonies revolted, and so, for nigh twenty years, the flag that waved over the Chateau de St. Louis represented an empire which included the entire American continent north of Mexico. And so, I say, I found myself thinking more of the old building that once was there than the fair landscape, as I stood leaning over the edge of Durham Terrace on a bright summer morning.

One night I shall not soon forget. The great Promenade was thronged with a gay multitude. The moon was at the half, and the St. Lawrence, far below, flowed silver white. The sails of ships hanging in their brails and all their yards and ropes gleamed like pale glass. Quebec's best band was playing, and the well modulated music flowed out upon the air, and swelled and sank in melodious waves along the sloped glacis of the great fortress and across the whitely flowing river. The white-haired man and the golden-headed child, the brunette and the blonde, the dark-robed nun and black-coated priest, the students of Laval and young graduates of Harvard and Yale, were mingled in the throng. In the pauses of the music of the band, a Spanish student, dressed in the habit of Cordova, was playing light Spanish airs and love songs that have been sung a thousand years beneath the listening windows of Seville, with dark, amorous eyes gazing down approvingly upon the serenader. Anon the "Marseillaise" swells up its sudden and fierce clash of sound, as a turbulent sea sends up its crests ragingly, and over all the vast space filled with the moving throng a hum of many voices rose, vague, indistinct, suggestive. It was a lovers' night in truth, and many a vow was whispered and exchanged, I warrant, and many a loving glance was given and returned, I know, for lovers were plenty all around me as I strolled along, and we old fellows, who have done with love-making ourselves, still have an eye to see and a heart to enjoy, thank God, the love-making and the mating going on around us, as we stroll down the way which leads us, as we trust, to the lovers and the loving, whose arms were once so warm and lips so sweet, as we were held and kissed by them in the old, sweet days so sadly gone. It is now near sunset with us, white-headed confrères of mine, and some of us are glad of it, as weary men, afield, are glad of gloaming. But they who should know — for they talk confidently — tell us that beyond the sunset we shall come to another sunrise, all dewy and fragrant, as the first one was, only sweeter, and all our fresh young life, yea, all the warmth and loving of it, and all the joy and gladness, along with those who made it so sweet to live and be, shall be ours again. If we were sure that it were so, then were it well if we did hurry on out of the gloaming and stand face to face with that far sunrise speedily.

Again the music rises and swells out above the river. It is the hymn of parting — “God Save the Queen” — and farewells are being spoken by many, and many a hand is being pressed and many a loving glance exchanged. Soon the vast throng are gone and I am left alone. The great Promenade is tenantless, silent, lonely. Only a few sounds come up from the lower town — the barking of a dog, a babe’s cry, a captain’s hail to his ship, the strong, robust call mellowed by distance — through the white moonlight lying softly on wharves and river, on silent parapet and chiming steeple. The silence of the place grows weird. The glamour of the old past is on me, and I see uncanny sights. Men and women long dead — dead these hundreds of years — pass me. Is not that man, the man in that angle there, Champlain? Surely it is he, the very same — the man who crossed the ocean twenty times, who shot the Iroquois chiefs on Lake Champlain, who founded this city two hundred and fifty years ago, and whose dust is under the altar there in the great Basilica. And who are these coming this way? Surely this is he, the brave old Lord de Frontenac, the bluff saviour of Canada. My lord, I greet you! This city belongs to you and Champlain. See, there goes Laval, ambitious priest and better scholar, who founded the great university yonder before John Harvard left his gift to letters in Massachusetts. Look! how old Frontenac frowns at him! And who is he in the angle of the promenade gazing southward? La Salle? Incredible. Why, his body sleeps beneath the flowers of a Texan prairie. Montcalm and Wolfe arm in arm! Brave captains, you fight no more. Look! look! Those two in the deep shadow of that old elm, that girl and young English midddy there. By heavens, that is Nelson, my Lord of Trafalgar, flirting with the lovely Mary Simpson! My God, this ground is haunted, and the dead of new and old France alike are here! I'll get me to the yacht and say my prayers. Beshrew me, this is a ghostly spot in truth!

Nature made Chambly Basin when in her finest mood. It was a place of beauty. The Indians described it to Champlain, in their pictorial language, as one of the homes of the Great Spirit.

He found it too beautiful for words, and, because of this, left it undescribed. The basin is nearly round, and its diameter is a full mile. At the southeast arc the Richelieu pours downward with wide white rapids. Their language is that of waters running at will, the great volume softly musical, with an undertone of compressed power. It seems to say: "Had I the wish, I could sweep these rocks and stones I sing around out of my path with the noise of thunder."

At the right of the rapids, looking up stream, stands the old fort. It was built by M. Chambly, a captain in the famous Carignan regiment, to whom was granted a large tract of territory upon the Richelieu as his seigneurie. This he held in fief of the King of France, and he was holden by feudal law to build an ample defense upon it. He chose this site, and with a soldier's eye, for it blocked the portage over which the savage Iroquois must come in bloody foray northward. He builded it of stones taken from the rapids, and made the walls thick and strong against all force then known in war, that he might sleep safely of nights when the dreaded Mohawks swarmed around him.

A ROMANTIC OLD FORTRESS.

The fort that my Lord of Chambly builded is nearly gone, but the form of the old-time fortress has been preserved in walls since builded, and one angle of the old structure remains. This angle stands upon the river's edge. The rapids run not twenty feet away, and standing in the casement of the chamber where Chambly once slept I might cast my fly among the bass that lazily fin themselves against the eddies that the rapids send whirling down. I note against the old, dusty wall the outlines of a fireplace. Those black stains upon yonder crumbling stones were made by smoke from brands my lord poked a hundred years ago. Here in his chamber, in this old angle above the brawling rapids, did he sit of winter nights when the snow whirled its white cold dust through the cracks in his lead-soldered window panes, and the ice in the basin bellowed as the great cracks opened in its three feet of depth suddenly from shore to shore. It was at that window, of summer evenings, when the basin mirrored the stars and pines, and the soft note of the whip-poor-will sounded in the still air, that he did place himself and gaze outward through the perfumed gloom and dream longingly of the gay court he had left in far-away France and of his beautiful mistress that perhaps mourned his continued absence, as she swore she should when, with sobs and the clinging of white arms around his neck, he bade her farewell. But women then were as they are to-day ; some are sweet and true and others are — very beautiful.

But a most lovely place must have been this Chambly Basin in those old days, with its pine-encircled water, its murmuring rapids, its bright sand beaches, and its white lilies. I sit upon the crumbled and crumbling wall, as the sun goes down, and muse of ancient days and the brave way men lived and died in them. I would I could undo the doing of a hundred and fifty years around this historic spot and put it all back as it was when the old fort stood and the brave Frenchman who builded it warmed himself at this old fireplace and gazed at sunrise and sunset out of this casement. What brave sport he and I would have ! The paddle and the trail together, the rod and rifle, the ambush made or shunned, the brave defense and sortie against our foes, and then the evening chat and story at the fire-side as we piled the beech and birch wood on until the chimney roared. What a dream and what a waking to the real! A bit of ancient wall with a man upon it, whose ears shrink at the profanity of the neighboring towpath as it comes hurtling through the evening air. And we call it civilization!

FORT MONTGOMERY.

At the national boundary line stands Fort Montgomery, a large, fine military work of chiseled stones, each one finished and laid with all the skill of masonry. It was begun, I think, in 1844, nor is it yet completed, nor will it ever be, I trust. We need no military work upon this continent between the northern and southern half of it. We Americans, whether Canadians or States men, are of one blood and destiny. Our race characteristics are the same, as are our commercial interests, habits, and ambitions. Geographically, the American continent is a unit, and the great people who are to inhabit it for centuries to come must be one also. Three hundred millions south of the St. Lawrence and thirty millions north of it are an impossibility. If they could not coalesce, the smaller section would surely be overborne, not by the force of arms, perhaps, but by the weight of commerce, the preponderating influences of trade and literature, and the forces, social, fiscal, and political, which belong to a swiftly moving and all-powerful development. It would be the height of folly for Canadians to set themselves against the inevitable, and by wrongful policy interrupt the flow and result of natural sequence. And 'tis nothing short of crime for our representatives at Washington to treat the so-called Canadian question as if it were one of present paltry gain, of dollars and cents, whose total is too inconsiderable in the great bulk of national commerce to be worthy of attention. Ottawa and Washington should act with large intelligence, and not petty scrutiny of petty things, and with one great thought ever in mind — that this vast continent, and all the peoples on it, are to be welded into one mighty and homogeneous nation and that, too, speedily. To me there are no Canadians, as distinct from us of the States. We are already seventy millions of Saxon, Celtic, and German blood upon the continent—the three bloods that rule the world to-day, and are to rule it for all the future—and we are all Americans, no more separate than Georgia is separate from Vermont, or New York from Ontario. And hence I say, I'm glad that Fort Montgomery was never completed, and trust it never will be. Its casemates and its cannon represent the past, a past forever dead and buried, and not the present, much less the future. There have been enough of war and blood upon the Richelieu, and there shall be no more forever. For centuries it was the Riviere aux Iroquois, and savages made it a river of blood. And then for a hundred years it was the River Richelieu, and the refined barbarism of cultured courts, plotting cabinets, and ambitious ministers crimsoned its current, its edges, and its lilies with Christian blood. But we have come to other times, happy and peaceful, and this little yacht, the happy tourist, the heavy boat of commerce, shall henceforth type it, and the laugh of happiness and lovers' song, in place of rifle and cannon shot, shall be heard between its maples and its willows.

SAILING DOWN THE RICHELIEU.

---

WHAT a vast difference there is between sailing around the shores of a country and sailing through it! In the one case, you see only the islands of the coast, the mouths of the larger rivers, a few bold bluffs, and here and there a landscape or a city site. In the other, you see all there is to see — the geology and the botany, its trees and shrubs and grasses, its farms and agricultural products, the barns and gardens, the dairy stock and horses, its people, young and old, rich and poor, and where and how they live. In brief, the country in all its characteristics and in all the peculiarities of its people is spread out before you. It is like going in through the back door of your neighbor's house and getting a glimpse of the kitchen and pantry. What a revelation of the family life and habits it is!

We sailed down the Richelieu river, from the international line to St. Johns. The river varies from a few rods to a mile in width. Some of its bends and stretches are charming. The wind was south and the yacht went sailing wing and wing, the great area of the sails, at full hoist, dwarfing the hull beneath. It looked like a huge bird, with vast white wings and golden feathered body, sailing along with pinions steadily set. The children ran out of the schoolhouses to see the strange, beautiful sight. The farmers in the fields stopped work and stood looking at us. Some came to the banks. The women ran to the porches of their dwellings. Some waved us signals. The cows, standing brisket deep in the cool water, gazed at us in wide-eyed wonder. The geese and ducks swam out athwart our course inquisitively, and clustered gossipingly in our wake when we had passed. And thus we went gliding along, past farm and garden spot, past schoolhouse and church, past habitant's cot and proprietor's mansion, past ferry and wharf, observing and observed. Surely, was there ever a method of interviewing a country like to this? Was there ever a fashion of locomotion so interesting and refreshing, and was there ever such a plan hit upon before to get at the very sources of the history and development of a country and the inner, everyday life of its people?

The roots of a nation's history are in its rivers.

They were its earliest pathways, and its infant trade was nursed upon their banks. On them its pioneer life was lived, its earliest sufferings borne, and its frontier battles fought. Along their banks its first crops were grown and products marketed. The rivers of a land are its ancient highways, and he who travels observingly on them gets glimpses of the olden times that may not be found elsewhere.

The sail down the Richelieu impressed this fact upon me. For two hundred years this water course has been the highway between the north and south. Great armies have toiled up and floated down its stream. Between these verdant banks came, first of white men who ever saw them, Champlain. Then follow Montcalm, Wolfe, Arnold, Montgomery, Schuyler, Sullivan, Carleton, Dieskau, Johnson, Putnam, Rogers, and all the great chiefs and scouts of the old wars. All these, with their thousands and ten thousands of followers, titled and unknown alike, have come and gone between these banks. There on my right is Bloody Isle, whose sands and sedgy reeds have many a time been red with human blood. There over the port bow is Isle le Noix, with its old earthworks, vast of size, within whose embankments an army might fight. The elms now grow, full seventy feet in height, upon their grassy crown, and the white lambs nibble and play in the old embrasures where cannon once exploded. Below us is the cove of death, where once was bloodiest ambush made, and where red and white men fought with knife and tomahawk, and rifle clubbed, until the shallow channel was paved with bodies so thick and deep that the living made of them a causeway over which they plunged to get at each other's throats. There is scarcely a curve in this stream, or points reaching into it, or isle or sand bar, that has not been fought over time and again. The great Richelieu and the greater Pitt, and kings, generals of fame, and noted diplomats, have all studied intently the map on which this little waterway was traced, as men study the cause and course of war and the way to victory and empire. And with all this history of its most notable past, we were, as we sailed down it, brought face to face. I doubt if any stretch of river of equal length in this country, or any country, has as much of history in it as this stretch on which we went sailing towards the north.

THE FREEMASONRY OF OUTDOOR LIFE.

---

WHAT a splendid Freemasonry this is of the outdoor life! How gentle and generous its rivalries! Which head shall dive deepest in the cool depths or speck the white surf farthest from shore? Which rod shall lift the heaviest trout, or gun show to its credit the fullest bag of game? Whose deck shall shine the cleanest, or whose white sails shall lead the fleet to evening's anchorage? Whose table of bark shall boast of the tenderest venison, or lodge front display for ornament the noblest spread of antlers? Whose rifle is truest to the camp when food is scarce, or is silent longest when game is plenty and the larder over-full? These are the generous and healthy rivalries of the outdoor life which stimulate but never fret, and leave both victor and vanquished healthy and happy still. Compare with these the scramble for wealth; the rivalries for gain; the suicidal despair of some; the vain and boastful bearing of others; the bitterness and ruin of those who lose; the arrogance of those who win; the sneering envyings and rankling jealousies, ripening to hatred as the years go on, which characterize the lives men live in store, office, and street, and note the contrast. Who of us frank-spoken and kind-hearted vagabonds of tide and field, of deck and camp, are envious of any? Each man we meet is comrade, fellow-picnicker, brother-man, partner of ours in the sweet profits of our healthy, happy, natural life. Mild mannered and light-hearted wanderers; boys with smooth or wrinkled faces; gray headed some of us, but boys still, thank God; disciples of the rod and gun; lovers of oar and sail; canoeists, campers, yachtsmen, our fires are lighted on a thousand shores, and our evening song floats over a thousand lakes and island studded rivers. We are a family of nature's saints. Our spirits have been touched and softened by the sweet grace of nature. We have been indoctrinated in the truths that shine out of stars and which the blue heavens declare at noon and night. The leaves of the Catechism we have studied have been the flowery meadows, the voiceful slopes of mountains, the shining beaches, the whispering leaves of trees, the thunder-shaken firmament, or the star-lighted depth of level waters. From these un-Calvinistic text-books we have learned sweet lessons of God, whose gentleness we saw in the very leaves we studied. Our souls have drank the waters of life, fresh from native fountains, and our spirits have bathed their scars in rivers which flow from Him whose voice is as the sound of many waters. All hail! ye healthy bodied, healthy minded, kindly hearted, gentle mannered saints of flood and field, of hill and river, of oar and sail, of deck and camp; your smiling faces rise before me in thousands, and your voices, in happy talk, in joke and song, come from far and stir the silence around me into laughter.

Joke, laugh and rest on, ye thrifty vagabonds and gentle loafers; into each hour you are storing the honey of health, on which in future days of toil and strain your strength shall feed and fill itself with vigor. I hail you, fellow saints in this lower heaven of God's where each happy worshiper is his own priest, each pure mind its own creed, and the gentle wishes of each heart the sum and substance of doctrine.

W. H. H.—ADIRONDACK—MURRAY'S

COMPLETE WORKS

CAREFULLY REVISED AND ENLARGED BY THE AUTHOR PUBLISHED FOR THE FIRST TIME IN UNIFORM EDITION

AND SOLD ONLY BY SUBSCRIPTION
IN SETS OF FIVE VOLUMES. . . . .

ADIRONDACK TALES

---

PUBLISHED BY
ADIRONDACK PUBLICATION COMPANY

---

Copyrighted by the Author
1898

DO NOT FORGET

THAT MR. MURRAY'S BOOKS ARE SOLD ...

ONLY BY SUBSCRIPTION,

AND CAN BE OBTAINED ONLY FROM SOME AUTHORIZED AGENT, OR DIRECTLY FROM THE AUTHOR

IN ALL MATTERS RELATING TO HIS WRITINGS OR HIS PLATFORM ENGAGEMENTS, ADDRESS THE . . . AUTHOR PERSONALLY . . . . .

ADDRESS,

W. H. H. MURRAY,
✻ GUILFORD, CONN. ✻
CARE THE MURRAY HOMESTEAD.

 CANVASSERS WANTED IN EVERY CITY AND TOWN.

STAMPED BELOW

RENEWED BOOKS ARE SUBJECT TO IMMEDIATE RECALL

LIBRARY, UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA, DAVIS

Book Slip-Series 458

PS2459 Murray, William Henry Harrison, 1840-1904.
M43 Mamelons, and Ungava, with supplementary D6 notes. [Springfield, Mass., Springfield 1898 Print. and Bind. Co.] cl898.
330 p. port. (His The Adirondack tales,
Mamelons was first issued in 1888 under ti
The doom of Mamelons.

DA

